MURRAY, IDAHO, February 11, 1912.

Senator W. BORAH,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Removal of duty on lead will be disastrous to this mine and to district as a whole. Mexican mining camps can deliver lead in New York at 3.15 and earn reasonable profit, due to nature of their deposits and cheap labor. Impossible to operate under these conditions. Why should we develop Mexico?

BENJAMIN G. HARMON,
Superintendent Bear Top and Orifino Consolidated Mining Co.

WALLACE, IDAHO, February 14, 1912.

Hon. W. E. BORAH,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Wallace Trades and Labor Council, embodying 20 labor organizations, desires to emphatically protest against the measure pending in Congress known as the Underwood bill, as an immediate and very great menace to the interests of every laboring man in the Coeur d'Alene district. We respectfully urge you to put forth your best efforts to prevent its passage in the Senate.

IRVING WILSON, President.

SPokane, WASH., February 12, 1912.

Senator W. E. BORAH,

Washington, D. C.:

Business conditions at our northern Idaho branches have shown a gradual improvement for the past year, and it is to be regretted that this prosperity is retarded by the possible passage of the Underwood bill. Any reduction in the present lead and zinc tariff will work a hardship on us.

THE UNITED STORES CO.

Senator BORAH,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned committee, were appointed at the last regular meeting of Burke Miners' Union, No. 10, of the Western Federation of Miners, to draft resolutions opposing the reduction of the tariff on lead and zinc, believing said reduction would be detrimental to the best interests of the men employed in the mining industry. Owing to the present conditions prevailing throughout the country, we believe the proposed reduction would have a very injurious effect, and we trust you will use your best efforts to oppose it. Thanking you in advance for your efforts, we remain,
Most respectfully,

P. S. DUMBOLTON.
MARK McKENNA.
C. V. SPYERS.

PROPOSED PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have information from the document room that there have already been requests sent in for more than the usual number of the report on the bill (H. The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Maryland.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LODGE. I move to take up the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Immigration with amendments.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill, which is a long one, be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we had better have the bill read. The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill and read to line 10, page 43.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the reading for a moment. It became necessary to have a reprint of the bill, owing to certain errors in amendments. The reprint, the corrected bill, has just come from the Printer.

I ask that corrected copies of the bill may be given to Senators, because the copies in the files are incorrect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, I withdraw my request for the reading of the bill at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Without objection, the further formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

Mr. LODGE. The bill will be read for amendment, and the committee amendments will be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be first read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was going to offer an amendment. I understand the bill will be read for amendment, section by section?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; it will be read for amendment, right through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read first for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer the following amendment to section 2 of the bill—

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the corrected bill may be distributed to Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The corrected bill will be distributed.

Mr. LODGE. I understand, under the agreement, that the bill is to be read for amendments, the committee amendments to be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is as the Chair understands. Without objection, the committee amendments will be first considered. Copies of the bill are being distributed. Is it the request that the reprint of the bill be read, or simply that the committee amendments be read?

Mr. LODGE. The bill has been practically read through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The further reading of the bill will be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought this was the committee bill.

Mr. LODGE. It is the committee bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee has proposed amendments in its own bill?

Mr. LODGE. No. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and the committee reports back the bill with sundry amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Amendments to the bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LODGE. Amendments to that bill.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the statement on the first page of the bill. Those portions of the bill which are printed in small capitals are changes in existing law, but are not amendments to the bill as introduced. The amendments to the bill as introduced are printed, as usual, in italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first committee amendment printed in italics.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 11, after the word "Cuba," to insert "the Bermudas."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that is a mistake which I thought had been corrected. It should be "the Bahamas."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be changed to read "the Bahamas."

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 4, line 2, after the word "section," to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "four."

Mr. LODGE. That is another misprint. It should be "twenty-four," not "four."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the correction will be made, and the word "twenty-four" will be inserted.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

That the annual amount collected from said aliens shall be used in defraying the expenses of administering the immigration laws and the maintenance of immigration stations, and any surplus remaining at the end of the fiscal year is hereby annually appropriated, to be paid as herein provided, to each State or Territory for the more complete endowment and maintenance of the farm-life schools now established, or which may be hereafter established, for the benefits of agriculture, to be applied only to instruction in agriculture, the English language, and various branches of mathematical, physical, natural, and economic science, with special reference to their applications in farm life, and to the facilities of such instruction, such as "to prepare boys for agricultural pursuits and farm life and girls for home making and house-keeping on the farm, including practical work on the farm by the boys and practical work in all subjects relating to housekeeping and home making by the girls": Provided, That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act unless such State or Territory shall appropriate a sum at least equal to the amount herein appropriated for a similar purpose.

That the sums hereby appropriated to the States and Territories for the endowment, support, and maintenance of farm-life schools now established, or hereafter to be established, shall be annually paid on or before the 31st day of July of each year by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the State or Territorial treasurer, or to such officers as shall be designated by the laws of said State or Territory to receive the same, who shall pay over said sums to the treasurers of the respective farm-life schools entitled to receive the same; and such treasurer shall be required to submit to the superintendent of public instruction in each State or Territory, and the superintendents of public instruction to the Secretary of Agriculture, on or before the 1st day of September of each year, a detailed statement of the amount so received and of its disbursements. The grants of moneys authorized by this act are made subject to the legislative assent of the several States and Territories to the purpose of said grants.

That if any portion of the moneys received by the designated officers of the State or Territory for the further and more complete endowment, support, and maintenance of the farm-life schools as provided in this act shall, by any action or contingency, be diminished, lost, or misapplied, it shall be replaced by the State or Territory to which it belongs, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be apportioned or paid to such State or Territory; and no portion of said moneys shall be applied, directly or indirectly, under any pretense whatever, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings. An annual report by the president of each of said farm-life schools shall be made to the superintendent of public instruction of each State, and the superintendent of public instruction shall report to the Secretary of Agriculture regarding the condition and progress of each school, including statistical information in relation to its receipts and expenditures, its library, the number of its students and instructors, and also as to any improvements and experiments made under the direction of any experiment stations attached or connected with said farm-life schools, with their costs and results, and such other industrial and economic statistics as may be regarded useful, one copy of which shall be transmitted by mail free to all other farm-life schools endowed under this act.

That on or before the 1st day of July in each year after the passage of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain and certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State and Territory whether it is entitled to receive its share of the annual appropriation for farm-life schools under this act, and the amount which thereupon each is entitled, respectively, to receive. If the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate from any State or Territory of its appropriation, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, and the amount involved shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the close of the next Congress, in order that the State or Territory may, if it should so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby charged with the proper administration of this law.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall annually report to Congress the disbursements which have been made in all the States and Territories, and also whether the appropriation of any State or Territory has been withheld; and if so, the reasons therefor.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that the amendments submitted by the Senator from North Carolina are to be printed and lie on the table, to be acted upon at some future time.

MR. OVERMAN. A part of the amendment has been printed, and the other part has not. Therefore I want to have it printed as a new amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed entirely as a new amendment.

MR. WATSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I thought it was to be acted on now, but as that is not the case I can offer it later.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, none of the amendments that are submitted are to be acted on at present.

MR. LODGE. No.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments submitted now will lie on the table, to be offered hereafter.

MR. LODGE. If Senators have amendments that they propose to offer, I think it will be very desirable that they shall be printed and go over with the bill. When Senators have offered their amendments, it is my intention to move an executive session.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that course of procedure in regard to amendments? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

MR. WATSON. My amendment is, on page 1, line 2, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-four" before the word "dollars."

MR. SIMMONS. I was not in the Chamber at the time the amendment the Senator from Massachusetts referred to a little while ago was passed over. I suppose it was the illiteracy-test amendment.

MR. LODGE. That amendment was passed over. It has not been acted on at all.

MR. SIMMONS. I have submitted a proposed amendment to the bill prescribing an illiteracy test, and I think I will probably want to offer it as a substitute for the provision in the bill which is intended to accomplish the same general purpose. I may, however, after a closer study of the provision, desist from my present purpose of offering it as a substitute. I make this statement so that I may not be hereafter precluded from that course should I so desire.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that he should offer his amendment to the reprint of the bill. As it was proposed to the old print it does not come in at the proper place.

MR. WATSON. I have offered it as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Oh, very well.

MR. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if it is his purpose to take this matter up early and press it to a vote?

MR. LODGE. I should like to dispose of it as soon as possible, but if the Senator desires to speak to his amendment, of course I shall endeavor to call up the bill at such time as will be agreeable to him.

MR. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that it is my present purpose to discuss the amendment somewhat at length. On account of a pressure of other matters I have not had time yet to get ready, and I hope the Senator will not press the bill until some days to come.

MR. LODGE. I shall certainly endeavor to give the Senator every opportunity. Of course, I desire to have the bill disposed of as soon as possible.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 4651) to amend section 171 of the penal laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

MR. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 23 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF.

MR. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 190), submitted by Mr. PERKINS on the 17th ultimo, reported it favorably, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the American instructors of the deaf, in style similar to that of the last report of said convention, and wrapped for mailing, 600 copies of the report of the nineteenth meeting of the convention of American instructors of the deaf, being Senate Document No. 139, Sixty-second Congress, second session.

EVERGLADES OF FLORIDA.

MR. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution 203, submitted by Mr. BRYAN, for Mr. FLETCHER, on the 1st instant, reported it favorably, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be printed 4,800 additional copies of Senate Document No. 89, Sixty-second Congress, second session, entitled "Everglades of Florida," 2,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 2,800 copies of which shall be placed on sale by the superintendent of documents.

MR. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire just a few minutes of the time of the Senate to make some observations with reference to Senate Document No. 89. The necessity for my doing so arises by reason of some general statements which have been made with reference to the Everglades of Florida and their reclamation. Such statements have been made so broad and there is such an absence of specification that the effect upon this great enterprise has been such as, in my judgment, to call for some explanation in connection with especially this document and the work which has been undertaken there.

In the Evening Star, of this city, of February 7, there appears this statement:

WRIGHT REVISES HIS REPORT.

The Senate document ordered printed last summer containing all public papers relating to the Florida Everglades did not contain the report made by former Department Engineer J. O. Wright, as revised by Chief Engineer Elliott, but contained a second revision of the report as made by Wright himself after he had left the employ of the Government and had become chief engineer of the State of Florida.

That is not true. There never was any revision of that report made after Mr. Wright severed his connection with the Government and was employed by the trustees of the internal improvement fund of Florida; there never was any attempted revision of it; there never was any opportunity for revision; there never was any desire to revise it; there never was any disposition on the part of Mr. Wright or the trustees of the internal improvement fund or the Florida authorities to revise in any way whatever the original report made by Mr. Wright while he was connected with that department of the Government. So the statement is absolutely without any foundation in fact whatsoever.

The further statement appears in the same newspaper to this effect—this is a quotation, apparently, from a letter written by Mr. Wright to the Secretary of Agriculture regarding the proofs of Senate Document 89 and proposed changes and insertions submitted by Mr. Elliott and sent with the proofs for consideration in connection with the proofs from the printer:

Senator FLETCHER was amazed, and requested me to come to Jacksonville and go over the matter with him. I did this, and the report was corrected to conform to the manuscript secured from your department. I have recently received a page proof of this document.

The reference in this letter was to the proofs of Senate Document 89, which were sent to Florida at my request for my examination before the document was finally printed. What was corrected was not the Wright report, but the proofs of Senate Document 89 as proposed to be amended by suggestions originating with Mr. Elliott, of the Agricultural Department. The only correction was to eliminate from the proofs of that document, as altered in pencil by Mr. Elliott, anything whatever that might in any degree change the Wright report. The effort on my part and on the part of Maj. Wright, who was thoroughly familiar with his own report, of course, and the work he had done in connection with the surveys of the Everglades, was to have the Senate document contain the Wright report as prepared by him, as ordered to the press by the Secretary of Agriculture, and as certified to the Secretary of Agriculture by the director, Dr. True.

In the Evening Star of Thursday, February 8, there appears this statement:

In connection with the Senators' visit it became known that a Senate document printed last summer, which was supposed to embrace all public papers relating to the Florida Everglades, did not, in fact, contain the report made by J. O. Wright when he was a department employee, but instead contained a second revision of the report made by Wright himself after he had left the employ of the Government and had become chief engineer of the drainage project under the State of Florida.

Neither of those statements is true. No foundation in fact exists for either statement. Senate Document 89 does contain the Wright report; Senate Document 89 contains the Wright report as originally made by him, prepared by him, submitted by him to his chief, approved by the chief, and as put upon the press for print. Senate Document 89 does not contain any sort of revision of the Wright report made at any time, and, as a matter of fact, as I have heretofore stated, Maj. Wright never attempted to revise that report after he left the employment of the Government and became engaged by the authorities in Florida. He made that report and submitted it while connected with the engineering department of the Government. It was agreed upon and ordered to press a year before he was ever considered by the trustees of the Internal Improvement Fund of Florida as a possibly available man to carry on the drainage operations in the Everglades, and his employment in Florida had no connection or relation whatever with his assignment by the Government to make that survey and examination and finally to make that report.

Another statement in the same paper of February 8 is as follows:

In the Senate document it was Mr. Wright's revised and approved report—that is, the report revised and approved by him after he had left the department and was connected with the drainage project—that was printed.

That statement is untrue and wholly unwarranted. There never was any revision, as I have said, of that report by him after he became connected with the drainage operations in Florida, and there was no desire or attempt to revise or change that report by him or by me or by the trustees. So far as I know, that applies to land companies and individuals interested in Everglade lands.

In the Washington Times of February 7 appears this statement:

Following the visit of Senator FLETCHER to Chairman Moss, it became known that the Senate document printed last summer, which was supposed to contain all papers relating to the Everglades and the investigations of the Federal Government, did not contain the full report made by J. O. Wright, former department engineer. The report, it appears, was once revised by Chief Engineer Elliott, and a second revision was made by Wright himself.

That statement is not true. The document does contain the report made by J. O. Wright, without the change of a word or a letter; there is not an "i" dotted in the original report that is not dotted in Senate Document 89, nor a "t" crossed in that report that is not crossed in that document. The further statement is made in that same paper:

This edition of the Wright report, it is said, was the one that finally was printed in the Record. It contains none of the references such as were included in the Elliott circular prepared in answer to a large number of requests for information from prospective investors in Florida Everglades lands.

Senate Document 89 does not contain what is here referred to as "the Elliott circular." I do not know who prepared that circular. In all the matter that has been printed on the subject it has obtained the name of "Elliott's circular." Whether Mr. Elliott prepared it or not, I do not know; but this I do know: That it was an unauthorized circular; that it was never an official document; that it has no place in any document that purports to give the public records and the official documents bearing on any subject; and that it therefore ought not to have been included in Senate Document 89, and was not included in that document. No fault can be found with me or with anybody else for leaving it out; no discredit can be brought upon Senate Document 89 for leaving out what is known as "the Elliott circular." Everyone will concede that when I mention the fact that when that circular was brought to the attention of the Secretary of Agriculture, not by land companies, not by people exploiting the Everglades or other lands in Florida, but when that circular was brought to his attention he disclaimed any knowledge of it, and when it was shown to him he condemned it and ordered that it be not printed or circulated. He did this on the ground that it did not purport to give data based upon scientific information; that it purported to express some opinions more or less relevant to the subject in a general way, but it did not give, what the Secretary very properly conceived to be the only duty of that department to give, the results of scientific research and scientific data. The Secretary therefore ordered it not to be printed, and ordered its circulation to be discontinued. That is the circular which, according to the comment that has been indulged in, was not included in Senate Document 89, and because the document does not contain that circular, condemned, denounced, and suppressed by the official head of the department, it is sought to discredit to some extent the document ordered printed by the Senate.

That document does contain the original Wright report, which was the result of investigations made by the engineering officers connected with the Agricultural Department of the Government, as finally agreed upon, adopted, and determined upon in that department, and as finally certified to the Printer for publication. Senate Document No. 89 contained every word, every letter of the Wright report. It has been all along the purpose, the hope, and the desire of the authorities in Florida that the Wright report should be published. There has never been any effort on their part to suppress it. There has been no effort on their part to suppress anything in connection with the Everglades that had any authenticity or had any responsible agency back of it; but, on the contrary, it has been their effort all the while to get all the data in reference to the Everglades and their reclamation published, and to give to the people of this country as full and accurate information on that subject as could be obtained.

The authorities in Florida have never at any time sought or desired to give other than the fullest and most accurate information bearing upon this great enterprise, which in importance and magnitude is second to none in this country. No other State is undertaking what the State of Florida is undertaking with reference to that great reclamation scheme. The State is interested to the extent of over a million and a half acres of land in what are known as the Everglades; and therefore statements intended or having the effect in a general sort of way to throw doubt upon land values in Florida, to bring discredit upon the Everglades and upon the work and operations in connection with their reclamation, and statements calculated to bring discredit, to some extent at least, upon this document, which is the last word upon the subject, containing, as it does, the records from the treaty with Spain down to date, and showing everything that has been done so far as the public records afford information, I say such statements, made for some reason or other I am unable to understand, reach to the interests of the State of Florida, reach to the trustees themselves in the management of that great trust, and they also concern people from all over this country who have invested in those lands. People from 40 States and Canada—perhaps more than 40 States, but at least that number—are interested there, and therefore it is a subject which concerns not only Florida, but people all over this country who have become interested in that region.

Therefore, in connection with the order for the printing of additional copies of Senate Document No. 89, for which there is great demand—the document room, the folding room, and Senators and Representatives are asking for additional copies of it—I thought it proper to make this statement in explanation of some of the matters which have been published in the public press and also to show that this document is an authentic publication containing public records which are official and which give the truth. The truth and the whole truth is all that is desired both by the officials in the State of Florida and those interested in that great enterprise.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to his colleague?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to suggest to my colleague, while he is making his statement, that I think it is due to him and to the Printing Office to state the changes that were made in the report from the time it was submitted to the Printing Committee by him until it reached him at Jacksonville some weeks later. Does not the Senator think a statement on that subject should be included in his statement in connection with this document?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means the suggested changes?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I mean the suggested changes. I think such a statement would be appropriate at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I did not intend to take up too much time on this subject, but I am perfectly willing to state everything in connection with the printing of this document and the facts leading up to the final proofs and the completion of the document. The particular reference by my colleague may be detailed briefly, as follows:

After the galley proofs had been run off it seems the Agricultural Department requested that they be sent down to that department. Congress had adjourned, and I was then in Florida. I had numerous requests for the document, and I inquired what was causing delay in getting out the proofs. I found that the proofs had been delivered to the Agricultural Department, I believe, on the request of Mr. Elliott. I wanted to know what that meant, because no one had solicited any help in that direction, so far as I knew. I thought I had all the data bearing on that subject already collected, and I could not understand this voluntary interference. After two weeks of delay occasioned by this interference, I was informed that the document had been returned by the Agricultural Department with numerous suggestions of changes in the Wright report as originally prepared, authorized, and determined upon, and with numerous suggestions for additional matter.

The additional matter consisted largely of correspondence, of general statements which had no real pertinency or bearing upon the facts and records proper to be included in the document. They would have made the document cumbersome and much more expensive, and contained matter really irrelevant and immaterial.

I called in Maj. Wright, who was then in Florida, because he had a copy of his original report with him, and I wanted to know about the suggestions submitted by Mr. Elliott. We found that Mr. Elliott sought to change the date of the original Wright report from June, 1909, to January, 1910; that he proposed to change the index of the document, so that instead of the index showing the Wright report on this subject it should show the report of C. G. Elliott, chief of engineers, instead of Wright. In other words the Wright report was to be appropriated and called the Elliott report. Numerous other changes were suggested by him which would have amounted to a change of the Wright report as prepared and as certified by Dr. True, and as ordered printed in June, 1909. I insisted that those changes should not be made; that we must stand upon the original, official, authenticated document, and there we have stood.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And which the Senate had ordered to be published.

Mr. FLETCHER. And which the Senate had ordered to be published. That report does appear in this document in that precise way. The word "corrected" is used by Maj. Wright in his letter to the Secretary. The correction which he mentioned referred to the proofs which had been sent down, containing suggestions, interlineations, pencil memoranda, and so forth, made by Mr. Elliott, of the Agricultural Department. Those were eliminated, and the document contains the original Wright report as it was prepared, and not as prepared, altered, or changed by Mr. Elliott.

That is the story with reference to the document; and thus "corrected" means the Wright report was made to conform to the Wright report as set up on the press by direction of the department itself. The proofs were sent back and the document was finally printed, containing this report in full, and is known now as Senate Document No. 89, which has the approval of the trustees and all persons, so far as I have been informed, who value trustworthy, accurate data on this important subject, and I am glad the Senate is willing to supply additional copies in response to the widespread demand.

I believe that is all, Mr. President, that I care to submit to the Senate at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 19, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for that providence which has shaped and guided the destiny of Thy children and which has led them, step by step, to the splendid civilization of our day; that we are privileged to live in this age of the world's history; that we are American citizens, blessed under our Constitution with civil, political, and religious liberty. Help us, we beseech Thee, to realize fully that as eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, so it is the price of everything sacred to our hearts. Inspire us, therefore, to use these gracious privileges to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BATTLE OF KINGS MOUNTAIN.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago Bishop E. E. Hoss, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, delivered a most instructive and interesting address before the Committee on the Library, which has under consideration House bill 4035, for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Campbell.

Bishop Hoss is one of the most learned and eloquent and also one of the best-beloved members of the college of bishops of the Southern Methodist Church. The Battle of Kings Mountain, of which he spoke, was fought at a crisis in the struggle for independence, and the victory achieved is conceded to have been a turning point in favor of the success of American arms. Gen. John Sevier, of Tennessee, and Gen. Isaac Shelby, of Kentucky, who first conceived and planned that great battle, will live in the history of the Revolutionary War along with Gen. Campbell and the other patriots who participated in it. The address of Bishop Hoss is an eloquent and instructive presentation of the difficulties encountered and the events leading up to the battle, as well as of the battle itself, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the address referred to:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I thank you very sincerely for the courtesy of this hearing, and I shall try to show my gratitude by confining my remarks within due limits. If I should, out of my exceeding interest, trespass too much on your time and attention, I beg that you will not for a moment hesitate to indicate the fact.

"That there may be no misunderstanding of my purpose in appearing before you, I shall begin by saying that I am here to oppose the passage in its present form of House bill 4035, which is identical with Senate bill 5295, and the object of which is to provide for the erection in the town of Abingdon, Va., of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Campbell, as the chief hero, so alleged, of the Battle of Kings Mountain in our Revolutionary War. Desiring to make no statement that would not stand the test of discussion and criticism, I solicited the presence on this occasion both of Senator MARTIN and of Representative SLEMP, who are the sponsors of the measure under consideration, and I very much regret the fact that they could not comply with my request. Their absence, however, will only make me the more careful to be utterly candid and fair in all that I shall say. In the end the exact truth will prevail, and any attempt to distort it, no matter by whom made, would prove a boomerang.

"There can be no shadow of doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the Battle of Kings Mountain is abundantly worthy to be commemorated by the Federal Government. In every important sense of the word it was a crisis in the struggle of our fathers for independence. Coming at a time when Georgia and South Carolina were in the iron grip of the British forces, and following hard upon Gates's disaster at Camden and Cornwallis's invasion of the Old North State, it put new heart into the desponding patriots throughout the whole country and set in motion that train of influence which issued in the crowning triumph at Yorktown.

"Among students who have given it their careful attention there is not the slightest difference of opinion as to its tremendous significance. Thomas Jefferson, who was good contemporary authority, said of it:

"It was the joyful enunciation of that turn in the tide of success that terminated the Revolutionary War with the seal of our independence.

"A hundred years later Theodore Roosevelt—who is always right except when he is wrong, and always interesting even when he is wrong, and frequently irritating even when he is right—added, in his The Winning of the West, volume 2, page 286:

"The victory was of far-reaching importance and ranks among the decisive battles of the Revolution. It was the first great success of the Americans in the South, the turning point in the southern campaign, and it brought cheer to the patriots throughout the Union. The loyalists of the Carolinas were utterly cast down and never recovered from the blow, and its immediate effect was to cause Cornwallis to retreat from North Carolina, abandoning his first invasion of that State.

"Similar judgments from competent historians could be multiplied by the score, and nobody with a right to speak has ever ventured to utter a contradictory opinion.

"All these things get an added emphasis from the circumstances that preceded and accompanied the expedition—circumstances which, in comparison, make such contests as those of Lexington and Bunker Hill look like holiday parades. For, bear in mind, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that the men who conceived and set on foot this great enterprise were members of a frontier community only a few thousand strong; that their own homes were in constant danger of attack from the Cherokee Indians, a fierce and valorous tribe, who were in close league with the British, and hung like a storm cloud upon the western skirts of the settlements; that they acted on their own initiative, being summoned by no government and receiving neither equipment nor compensation for their services; that they did not wait till the enemy was at their own gates, but took the offensive and went in search of him, thus making common cause with all the colonies, and especially with the two Carolinas; that they marched 12 full days over one of the roughest routes ever traveled by a mounted army, right square across both the Alleghanies and the Blue Ridge; that for the last 36 hours, the most of the time in a pouring rain, they were out of their saddles only once, and then for but an hour; that at the end of this long ride, tired almost to exhaustion though they were, they threw themselves on a foe numerically as strong as themselves, securely posted, well drilled, and commanded by one of the bravest and most accomplished officers in the British Army; and that, within a little more than an hour they achieved what, taken all in all, was one of the most signal victories of the war, killing, wounding, or capturing nearly every one of their antagonists. Sirs, if there be any citizen of the United States whose blood does not flow a little faster at the recitation of such a story, I envy him not.

"For elaborate accounts of all that I have thus in brief set forth, and for a vast array of other related facts and incidents, see the chapters ad rem in Haywood's Civil and Political History of Tennessee, Ramsey's Annals of Tennessee, Wheeler's History of North Carolina, Kirke's Rear Guard of the Revolution, Roosevelt's The Winning of the West, and, especially, the wonderfully full account in Draper's Kings Mountain and Its Heroes, in the preparation of which the author spent 40 laborious years. I might add an indefinite number of other authorities, but do not wish to cumber the pages of this brief.

"Why, then, you may be inclined to ask, am I opposing the bill under notice. My answer to such an inquiry shall be very concise; it is because this bill coolly proposes to bestow upon the single State of Virginia the honor of the whole undertaking, which primarily belongs to the States of Tennessee and North Carolina, and upon Col. William Campbell the whole credit, which primarily belongs to Isaac Shelby and John Sevier. When I tell you that I am a Tennessean and a descendant of Sevier, you will perhaps need no further explanation of my attitude.

"The report on which the Senate has already acted was drawn up, or was at least presented, by the late Senator John W. Daniel, a man so high and clean in character that it would be folly to call in question the sincerity of his motives. Nearly everything in it is strictly true. The only paragraph to which I should seriously object is the quoted one that suggests the superior quality of the Virginians on the upper Holston to their Tennessee neighbors lower down the same stream. It is unfortunate that such a hint—so wide of the fact, and so entirely without bearing on the case—should have been introduced into a printed document. I shall not waste time in seeking to rebut it. My chief quarrel with the report is based not on what is in it, but on what is left out of it. A casual reader, glancing through it, would not infer that the Tennesseans and North Carolinians played anything more than a very unimportant part in the affair with which it deals, though at one place, presently to be noticed, their primacy is conceded in two or three lines.

"Do not suppose for one moment, gentlemen, that I wish to belittle what the Virginians did at this great juncture. Then, as ever, they played the man. Myself of Virginia blood and ancestry reaching back to 1650, I am proud of the record which the Old Dominion has put into our national history. Nor shall I be guilty of the low task of trying to asperse the good name of Col. Campbell, who was unquestionably a brave and patriotic man, and whose posterity embraces a body of American citizens equal to the best to be found in all the land. The old controversies, which did not touch any essential point in his character but bore only upon his action during the latter part of the battle, ought never to have been raised, and should certainly now be allowed to rest.

"All this said, however, there are some important facts that, in the interests of truth and justice, must not be overlooked.

"WHO ORIGINATED THE EXPEDITION?"

"It is certain that Gen. Campbell had nothing in the world to do with it. The credit of it belongs solely and wholly to Isaac Shelby and John Sevier. More than this, Col. Campbell was with difficulty persuaded to join in it, even after it was set on foot. See Shelby's pamphlet published as an appendix to Draper's Kings Mountain and Its Heroes, pages 560-563; Draper's own statement, pages 168-173; Roosevelt's The Winning of the West, pages 252-255; Ramsey's Annals of Tennessee; and Senator Daniel's report, page 6, lines 26-30.

"The following short outline embodies the substance of what is contained in these volumes: During the summer of 1780 Col. Shelby, Maj. Charles Robertson, and Capt. Valentine Sevier, a younger brother of Col. Sevier, went on a campaign into South Carolina with about 200 men and participated in the successful battles of Thicketty Fort, Musgroves Mills, and Cedar Spring. On their return to their homes they were pursued as far as to Gilbert Town, N. C., near the foot of the mountains, by the British colonel, Ferguson, who, by all accounts, was one of the most courageous and most capable soldiers in the King's army. Through a paroled prisoner, one Samuel Phillips, he sent word to the mountain men from that point that if they did not at once lay down their arms he would cross over the intervening ranges, hang their leaders, and devastate their country. Never did a vain and insolent message meet with a swifter response. Phillips took it straight to Col. Shelby, of Sullivan County, who was his kinsman and lived near the present city of Bristol. Within a day or two Shelby mounted his horse and rode about 50 miles to see Col. John Sevier, of Washington County. When he started on that ride there is not the slightest evidence that he had formed any definite plan of action. On the contrary, he himself affirms over and again that he and Sevier between them—they were together two full days—determined, 'after some consultation,' what they would do. Here is his exact language, repeated for substance in many places: 'In a few days I went 50 or 60 miles to see Col. Sevier, who was the efficient commander of Washington County, N. C., to inform him of the message I had received and to concert with him measures of defense.' But before they separated all thought of mere 'defense' was abandoned, and an agreement was reached to strike the first blow. 'After some consultation,' continues Shelby, 'we determined to march with all the men we could raise, and attempt to surprise Ferguson by attacking him in his camp, or at any rate before he was prepared for us.' Which of the two leaders first proposed this bold stroke can never now be known. Neither of them, as far as I am aware, ever claimed the exclusive honor of it. Somehow or other it came out in the course of their discussion, but any attempt to say just how must now be futile. The minds of the two men were like flint on steel. (See Appendix to Draper, p. 562.)

"Having decided on the main point, Shelby and Sevier went vigorously to work to arrange all the details of the proposed campaign. They resolved, first, to get their regiments in readiness and rendezvous at the Sycamore Shoals of the Watauga on September 25; secondly, to secure, through Sevier's efforts, the cooperation of Col. Charles McDowell and the 160 North Carolina refugees, who had crossed the mountains for safety and were scattered among the residents of the Watauga and the Nolichucky; thirdly, to secure through Col. Shelby the cooperation of Col. William Campbell and the men under him in the adjacent district of Virginia; and, fourthly, to raise on their personal security the sum of $15,000 for the purchase of necessary equipment.

"Everything went through without a hitch, except that Col. Campbell at first positively declined to lend his assistance, stating that he was minded to raise what men he could and march down into southern Virginia, to oppose Lord Cornwallis as he approached that State. Shelby himself shall tell the rest of the story. He says:

"Of this"—

"Campbell's refusal—

"I notified Col. Sevier by an express the next day, and at once issued an order calling on all the militia of the country to hold themselves in readiness to march at the time appointed. I felt, however, some disappointment at the reply of Col. Campbell. The Cherokee towns were not more than 80 or 100 miles from the frontiers of my county; and we had received information that these Indians were preparing a formidable attack on us in the course of a few weeks. I was, therefore, unwilling that we should take away the whole disposable force of our counties at such a time; and without the aid of the militia under Col. Campbell's command I feared that we could not otherwise have a sufficient force to meet Ferguson. I, therefore, wrote a second letter to Col. Campbell, and sent the same messenger (Moses Shelby) back with it immediately, to whom I communicated at large our view and intentions, and directed him to urge them on Col. Campbell. This letter and messenger produced the desired effect, and Campbell wrote me that he would meet me at the time and place appointed. It surely can not detract from the merits of Col. Campbell that this expedition was set on foot, not by him, but by others. He lived in Virginia, in a state of comparative security, and was preparing to aid his own State when she should be invaded. We lived in North Carolina, a great part of which was prostrate before the British arms. We were nearer to the enemy and were threatened. We determined, therefore, to anticipate the invasion and vengeance that were meditated against us, and to strike the first blow. To do this effectually, we asked for, and we received, the aid of the nearest county in a neighboring State. This was surely the natural and ordinary course of things."

"Such first-hand evidence from such a man as Shelby, even if it stood alone, would be sufficient to establish my contention; but it does not stand alone. Every historian of any consequence confirms it in toto. In short, then, Shelby and Sevier, with Campbell or without him, and even if they had to strip their own counties of every available fighting man, had fully made up their minds to take the risk of meeting Ferguson's bluff; but they naturally desired to avoid, if it were possible, the necessity of leaving their families utterly exposed to the tender mercies of the Cherokees. For this latter reason, they asked for and, after some delay, received the generous support of Col. Campbell and his men.

"The later career of Gen. Campbell is given so fully in Senator Daniel's report that it is scarcely necessary to repeat it here. Suffice it to say that he took an honorable part in the Battle of Guilford Court House and one or two other minor engagements, then resigned his commission in the Army and was elected to represent Washington County, Va., in the State legislature. In 1781, however, he was made a brigadier general of the Virginia line and recalled to the field under Lafayette. During August of the same year he was seized with a sudden illness and died a few days afterwards in his thirty-sixth year, to the grief of the whole Commonwealth.

"Both Shelby and Sevier lived on until old age, with increasing fame to the end, the latter expiring in 1815 and the former not till 1826. The following sketch of Shelby is taken without change from the Souvenir Program published on the occasion of the presentation of a portrait bust to Memorial Continental Hall at the Twentieth Congress of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution:

"Born December 11, 1750, in Frederick County, Md., near the North Mountain and in the vicinity of Hagerstown. Employed until 21 years of age in farming and herding cattle for his father, Capt. Evan Shelby. In 1771 removed with other members of the Shelby family to the Holston region in southwest Virginia. Shared the customary experiences and adventures of a pioneer and frontiersman. Served as lieutenant in company of Fincastle troops, of which his father, Evan Shelby, was captain, in Dunmore's War, fighting valiantly at Point Pleasant on October 10, 1774. Of the affair at Point Pleasant, which has often been called 'the first battle of the American Revolution,' Lieut. Shelby, in a letter to his uncle, John Shelby, written a few days after the battle, has left us the best first-hand account. He remained as second in command of a garrison at the mouth of the Great Kanawha until July, 1775. For nearly a year following he explored, located, and surveyed lands in Kentucky. In July, 1776, while in Kentucky, he was appointed captain of a minute company by the committee of safety in Virginia. In 1777 he was appointed by Gov. Patrick Henry, of Virginia, a commissary of supplies for an extensive body of militia guarding the frontier posts. In 1778 he was engaged in the commissary department, providing supplies for the Continental Army and for an expedition, by way of Pittsburgh, against the northwestern Indians. He rendered similar service in 1779. In the spring of that year he was elected a member of the Virginia Legislature from Washington County, and in the fall of the same year was commissioned a major by Gov. Thomas Jefferson, in the escort of guards to the commissioners for establishing the boundary line between Virginia and North Carolina. By the extension of this line his residence was found to be in North Carolina, and shortly afterwards he was appointed by Gov. Caswell a colonel of the new county of Sullivan. On the 30th of July, 1780, he captured a formidable Tory stronghold on the Pacolet River. He was largely responsible for the victory in the Battle of Musgrove's Mill, August 18, 1780; was one of those in chief command in the Battle of King's Mountain, October 7, 1780, and contributed most largely to the success there achieved. A few months later, in command of a troop, he joined Gen. Francis Marion, and served under him until near the end of the war.

"In 1781 he was elected a member of the North Carolina Legislature; in 1783 moved to Kentucky; member of three of the Kentucky conventions held in 1787, 1788, and 1789, preparatory to applying for statehood; in January, 1791, appointed with Gen. Charles Scott, Benjamin Logan, and two others a member of the local board of war, created by Congress for the district of Kentucky, with full discretionary power to provide for the defense of the frontier settlements and the prosecution of the war with the Indians; high sheriff of Lincoln County, Ky., until his election as governor in May, 1792; member of convention which framed first constitution of Kentucky in April, 1792; one of the first trustees of Transylvania Seminary (afterwards Transylvania University), appointed in 1783; also member and chairman of the first board of trustees of Center College, founded in 1819; first governor of Kentucky, 4th of June, 1792-1796; again elected governor, 1812-1816; and led 4,000 Kentucky volunteers to join Gen. Harrison in the Northwest for the invasion of Canada, where the British were defeated at the Battle of the Thames, 5th of October, 1813. For his heroic services in this campaign and battle he was awarded a gold medal by Congress on the 4th of April, 1818. In 1817 selected by President Monroe as Secretary of War, but declined office on score of age. Was one of the presidential electors for Kentucky in 1797, in 1801, and in 1805. In 1818 was commissioned with Gen. Andrew Jackson to hold treaty with Chickasaw Tribe of Indians for purchase of lands west of Tennessee River, which service he performed with entire satisfaction to all parties concerned. Died 18th of July, 1826, at his historic home, "Traveler's Rest," Lincoln County, Ky. Counties in nine States have been named Shelby in his honor. Married at Boonesboro, Ky., in 1783, Susannah Hart, daughter of Capt. Nathaniel Hart, one of the proprietors of the Transylvania Co.

"Sevier was born September 23, 1745, 6 miles from the present village of New Market, in what was then Augusta and is now Rockingham County, Va. His father, Valentine Sevier 1st, the son of a Huguenot refugee and an English mother, had come to the colony from London between 1730 and 1740, settling first in Culpeper and removing thence to the valley; and his mother, Joanna Goode, was the granddaughter of John Goode, who immigrated by way of the Barbados in 1650, and became the ancestor of an immense posterity. Sevier himself, after securing at Staunton the best education obtainable on the border, was married in his seventeenth year to Miss Sarah Hawkins, the daughter of Mr. Joseph Hawkins and the granddaughter of Samuel Hawkins, one of four brothers who came over about 1685. Before he was 25 he had amassed what was for that time a comfortable fortune in farming and merchandising. He had also taken some part in the French and Indian War and had been appointed a militia captain by Lord Dunmore, the last royal governor of Virginia. After two trips in 1771-72 to the infant settlement on the Holston he removed his family thither in the early winter of 1773, reaching his destination on Christmas Day of that year. His next brother, Valentine Sevier 2d, had preceded him, and his venerable father, then 74 years of age, and his four brothers and three sisters, accompanied him.

"From the day of his arrival in the Holston country he was a marked man, as he would have been anywhere. His primacy on the border for the next 40 years is an indisputable fact. Almost at once he was elected one of the five judges of the Watauga Association, the self-governing community, which the newcomers, with the hereditary political instincts of English-speaking people, had organized for their own protection. In 1776, in connection with James Robertson, he defended Fort Lee, near Elizabethton, against an attack of the Cherokee Indians. In the autumn of the same year he drew up the petition to the provincial council of North Carolina, praying to be formally annexed to that colony. This document, full of courage and patriotism, was signed by 115 persons, only 2 of whom found it necessary to make their marks. A little later he was chosen, together with John Carter and John Haile, to represent the Watauga and Nolichucky region, thenceforth known, first, as Washington District and after 1777 as Washington County in the provincial congress, which met at Halifax November 12, 1776, and framed the first constitution of North Carolina. Even at that early date he foresaw the necessity at some future time of a new State beyond the mountains, and secured the insertion into the constitution of a clause providing for it.

"In 1777 he was made lieutenant colonel of the Washington County militia, and full colonel, to succeed Col. John Carter, on February 3, 1781. Between the first-mentioned date and 1793 he was in 35 battles or skirmishes with the British and Indians, and was never once defeated. John Fiske says that he speedily won for himself the title of 'the lion of the border.' Gov. Blount declared at the time that 'his name carried more dismay than a regiment of soldiers.' McMaster affirms that 'he lived more romances than were ever written in any book.' Phelan says:

"No one, indeed, was more generous than he. In many respects he was one of the heroes of our history, a veritable knight templar.

"Roosevelt adds at greater length:

"For many years Sevier was the best Indian fighter on the border. He was far more successful than Clark, for instance, inflicting greater loss on his foes, though he never had anything like Clark's number of followers. His mere name was a word of dread to the Cherokees, the Chickamaugas, and the Upper Creeks. He wielded great influence over his own followers, whose love for and trust in 'Chucky Jack' were unbounded. He was open-hearted and hospitable, with winning ways toward all, and combined a cool head with a dauntless heart. He loved a battle for its own sake, and was never so much at ease as when under fire.

"The mere list of Sevier's services, civil and military, would fill a page. From 1780 to 1784 he led half a dozen brilliant campaigns against the Indians, besides joining with Shelby, in response to an appeal of Gen. Greene, on an expedition of relief to Marion. From 1784 to 1788 he was governor of the abortive State of Franklin, which was created out of necessity when North Carolina ceded its western territory to the moribund Continental Congress. That this movement was not intended as an act of disloyalty to the General Government is evident from the fact that it promptly sent its Representative, in the person of William Cocke, to Congress, asking to be admitted with the other Colonies. When it collapsed in 1788, Sevier was indicted for treason against the State of North Carolina. With this indictment hanging over him he was elected to the State senate in 1789, and went to Fayetteville to claim his seat. By act of the legislature all his disabilities were promptly removed, and he was designated brigadier general for the whole section from which he came. What is now the State of Tennessee was also set up as a congressional district, and in 1790 he was, without opposition, elected to the Federal Congress, and sat in that body as the very first Representative from the Mississippi Valley.

"North Carolina having made, in 1790, another act of cession of the territory to the Federal Government, Sevier was named by President Washington both as brigadier general of the militia and as a member of the governor's council or Territorial senate, both of which positions he continued to hold till 1796, when Tennessee was admitted into the Union. He was then chosen first governor of the State, and by two subsequent re-elections occupied the gubernatorial chair till 1801. Being succeeded by Archibald Roane, he became a candidate for the major generalcy of the State militia, a post then for the first time created, with Andrew Jackson, 20 years his junior, as his antagonist. The choice was in the hands of the field officers, and the balloting resulted in a tie. Roane, as governor, cast the deciding vote, which, by the way, sent Jackson to New Orleans and probably affected the whole subsequent history of the country.

"In 1802 Sevier was one of the commissioners to run the boundary line between Virginia and Tennessee. The next year, being again eligible under the constitution, he once more sought the governorship, and though Roane, with the active and vociferous backing of Jackson, stood against him, he was elected by a large majority, and continued for three other terms, the last two without even a show of opposition. For 1810-11 he was a member of the State senate. From 1811 to 1815 he was a Member of Congress from the Knoxville district, serving during the whole period of our second war with England as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. Madison, at the beginning of the war, offered him a generalship in the Army, but he declined it on the score of advanced age. It is also to be said that President Adams had given him a similar post in the Provisional Army in 1798, when war was threatened with France.

"At the close of the congressional session of 1815 President Monroe appointed him one of the commissioners to run the lines of the Creek Indians in Alabama. While on that service he died in camp on the east side of the Tallapoosa, near Fort Decatur, Ala., September 24, 1815, being 70 years and 1 day of age. During his absence from home his constituents had unanimously reelected him to Congress. His remains rested in their lonely grave until 1887, when the State of Tennessee, which had treated his memory with a niggardliness beyond conception, appropriated the munificent sum of $500 to remove the dust to Knoxville. A ceremonious reinterment, participated in by thousands of people, took place in the courthouse grounds of that city. Private citizens, in default of public action, erected a handsome monument over his grave.

"In view of the foregoing facts, Phelan is doubtless justified in saying:

"John Sevier is the most prominent name in Tennessee history, and within these limits and upon this field he is the most brilliant civil and military figure this State has ever produced. * * * His enthusiasm, his daring, his resolute quickness, his knightly disposition made him the idol of his soldiers and his neighbors. * * * To say that he was in his sphere a statesman of the first order of ability, and that as a warrior he was excelled by none who engaged in the same mode of warfare, and that he never lost a battle, claims for him a high place among the great men of the world. * * * The basis of his character was laid in truth and in honor. He was loved because he had a loving heart. * * * The gentle word, the quick sympathy, the open hand, the high purpose, the dauntless courage, the impetuosity, the winning suavity were the wings and the turrets and the battlements of a magnificent and harmonious structure.

"It is a somewhat remarkable fact that while most American historians seem to have a personal grudge against our other Tennessee hero, 'Old Hickory,' they are all fascinated by Sevier. With one more quotation from Roosevelt I shall close my account of him:

"Sevier, who came to the Watauga nearly a year after Robertson and his little colony had arrived, differed widely from his friend in almost every respect save high-mindedness and dauntless, invincible courage. He was a gentleman by birth and breeding. * * * To the end of his days he was an interested and intelligent observer of men and things both in America and Europe. He corresponded on intimate and equal terms with Madison, Franklin, and other of our most polished statesmen. * * * Sevier was a very handsome man, reputed during his life the very handsomest in Tennessee. He was tall, fair-skinned, blue-eyed, brown-haired, of slender build, with erect, military carriage and commanding bearing. * * * From his French forefathers he had inherited a gay, pleasure-loving temperament that made him the most charming of companions. His manners were polished and easy, and he had great natural dignity. * * * Such were Sevier and Robertson; and these two men afterwards proved themselves to be, with the exception of George Rogers Clark, the greatest of the first generation of trans-Allegheny pioneers.

"WHAT FORCES THE VARIOUS STATES PUT INTO THE EXPEDITION.

"On September 25, as above stated, the backwoodsmen mustered at Sycamore Shoals, on the Watauga River, in what was then Washington County, N. C., and is now Carter County, Tenn. Shelby and Sevier brought each 240 men, or about one-half the fighting strength of their respective regiments. McDowell brought 160 North Carolina refugees, eager to return and fight for their own soil, and William Campbell 200 Virginians. The next day Arthur Campbell appeared with 200 more, gathered from farther east. These he turned over to his cousin, while he himself went back home. The start was made, therefore, with 1,040 men. A more romantic scene was never witnessed. Beside the soldiers, who were clad in homemade hunting shirts and buckskin shoes, armed with Dechard rifles, and mounted on tough horses, there were hundreds of others present to say good-by. Among the latter was Samuel Doak, the Presbyterian minister, a graduate of Princeton and the founder of the first college west of the Alleghenies, who feared God so much that he feared nothing else, and would have made a fit chaplain for a regiment of Cromwell's Ironsides—a man of immense influence on the early history of the State.

"On September 30, having made the passage of the mountains, the army reached Quaker Meadows, the beautiful home of Col. McDowell, and received its first reinforcement of 350 North Carolina militiamen from the counties of Wilkes and Surrey, who were creeping along through the woods, hoping to meet with some party going to harass the enemy.

"They were commanded by Benjamin Cleaveland, a mighty hunter and Indian fighter and an adventurous wanderer in the wilderness. He was an uneducated backwoodsman, famous for his great size and his skill with the rifle, no less than for the curious mixture of courage, rough good humor, and brutality in his character.

"It can not be said that he was very devout in his life, but he was, nevertheless, a most orthodox Presbyterian in his belief. One of his grim pieces of humor, as we learn from the diary of Lieut. Allaire, of the British Army, who was captured at Kings Mountain, was to require the prisoners under his charge, officers and all, to attend divine service and listen to a Calvinistic sermon 'as full of republicanism as the rebel army is of horse thieves.' It is even said that he was a ruling elder, with the accent, no doubt, on the word ruling.

"Five days later Hill, Hampton, Lacey, and Williams fell in with about 400 men, chiefly from York and Chester Counties, S. C. Smaller detachments under Chronicle and Hambright, from Burke and Lincoln Counties, N. C., and under Maj. William Chandler, from Georgia, as well as a number of straggling bands, were likewise taken up on the march, raising the total strength of the army to between 1,850 and 1,900 men. It will thus be seen that Virginia furnished only a little more than one-fifth of the men on the march. That they were real men nobody should be rash enough to deny.

"Late in the evening of October 5, after a march of only 12 miles during the whole day, a halt was made at Green River. Both men and horses were so jaded that the leaders knew it would be impossible for the whole of them to move fast enough to overtake Ferguson, who had rapidly fallen back in front of them from Gilbert Town. They, therefore, determined to select about 750 of their least tired and best mounted men, and make a bold push for their game, leaving the rest to follow as rapidly as possible. For days they had been living on green corn, but before starting on the final stretch they slaughtered some beeves and had a great feast. At the Cowpens on the evening of the 6th they met the South Carolinians before mentioned, enough of whom joined in the advance to bring their strength up to 910, besides a squad of perhaps 50, who followed on foot, and some of whom managed to get up in time for the fighting. Of the 910, only 200 were of Campbell's Virginians.

"Then came a marvelous feat of endurance. Leaving Cowpens after dark, these resolute patriots marched without halting through the whole night, which was dark and drizzly. Many of them got scattered in the woods, but rejoined their commands at break of day. Right on to the south they bore, never pausing nor slacking their gait. In the course of the morning a pouring rain came down upon them, but they wrapped their blankets about their rifles, sat in their saddles, and spurred ahead. At a little after noon, October 7, they had reached the end of their journey, and were not more than 3 miles from the elevated spur, 500 or 600 yards long and 250 wide from base to base, on which Ferguson had taken his position and was waiting for the help from Cornwallis which never came. Of the battle itself I shall speak hereafter. Another matter demands attention now.

"THE QUESTION OF A COMMANDER.

"Until the expedition had reached Cane Creek, on October 4, no question appears to have arisen about a commander in chief. Each colonel, as was customary in border warfare, led his own men. As, however, some lack of discipline had shown itself, and as they were now approaching the enemy, it was wisely thought necessary to have one head for the rest of the march and for the battle which seemed certain to be fought. This place would naturally have fallen to Col. McDowell, who was the senior officer present, and, besides, was then in his own district. But he was not deemed sufficiently alert for such a post. So the determination was formed to send a messenger to the camp of Gen. Greene and ask for a general officer to assume the command. McDowell consented to the plan and volunteered to be the bearer of the written message, which was signed by the colonels in the following order: Cleaveland, Shelby, Sevier, Campbell, Hampton, and Winston. (See Roosevelt, Vol. II, p. 263, footnote.)

"In the meantime Shelby nominated Campbell as temporary commander, and he was chosen nem. con. The reasons assigned by Shelby for his action were as follows: McDowell would not have submitted gracefully if any one of the North Carolina colonels, all of whom were his juniors in rank, had been preferred before him; and, secondly, Campbell was not only a Virginian and less likely to arouse McDowell's jealousy, but he was also at the head of the largest regiment.

In this way—

"Says Shelby—

and upon my suggestion, was Col. Campbell raised to the command, and not on account of any superior military talents or experience he was supposed to possess. He had no previous acquaintance with any of the colonels except myself, nor had he at that time any experience or distinction in war that we knew of.

"How much and how little Campbell's elevation meant is indicated by Draper, who says, page 190:

Col. Campbell now assumed the chief command, in which, however, he was to be directed and regulated by the determination of the colonels, who were to meet every day for consultation. Equally significant is the fact that the report of the battle, which was made several days after it occurred, was signed first by Cleaveland, then by Campbell, and then by Shelby. Sevier's name was not attached, he having already started home to meet a threatened uprising of the Cherokees.

"Dr. Draper says, footnote to page 352:

Perhaps, as a compliment, Col. Cleaveland was permitted to head the list in signing the report, as shown in facsimile in Lossing's Field

Book of the Revolution. But when Gen. Gates sent a copy, November 1, 1780, to Gov. Jefferson, to forward to Congress, having properly placed Campbell's name first, Shelby's next, and Cleaveland's last, and so they appear as published in the gazettes at the time by the order of Congress.

"Whether Col. Campbell, who carried the report to Jefferson, suggested the change, which there would have been no impropriety in his doing, can not now be told. The circumstances are warranted simply as showing that Campbell's command carried no such precedence, in the estimation of his associates, as would belong to a commander in a thoroughly organized modern army.

"THE BATTLE ITSELF.

"And now, gentlemen of the committee, having followed the track of the patriot army from Sycamore Shoals to within about 3 miles of Kings Mountain, it remains to give a brief account of the battle itself, which will show that no one of the colonels in command had such a preeminence in the actual fighting as to entitle him to the sole credit of the victory.

"After falling back for some days in a leisurely and circuitous fashion, Ferguson had halted here and gone into camp. Why he should have done so it is difficult to say. He knew that he was pressed by a strong force. His appeal to Cornwallis for 300 or 400 dragoons shows that he was not insensible to the dangers that compassed him about, though it is evident that he had taken no accurate gauge of the martial qualities of his adversaries. If he had moved right on from Gilbert Town without needless delays, he might easily have reached Cornwallis's main army at Charlotte, 35 miles distant. The only rational explanation of his conduct is to be found in the assumption that, as a proud and successful British officer, unused to defeat or retreat, he could not bear the thought of being driven in for safety by what he was pleased to describe as 'a horde of banditti.' In short, it was simply another case of pride going before destruction and a haughty spirit before a downfall.

"The spot which Ferguson chose for a 'secure encampment' was simply one of the ridges of Kings Mountain, 60 feet high, 500 or 600 yards long, 70 yards broad on top, and 250 or 300 yards from base to base. It was bare on the summit, but covered with bowlders and trees on the sides, a fact which, as ought to have been foreseen, gave a great advantage to an attacking force. The only supply of water was a rather inconveniently situated spring on the northwest of the mountain. An abundance of wood might have been secured for abatis, but Ferguson did not take the precaution to use it. In fact, the only appearance of defense was the line of baggage wagons drawn up in the neighborhood of headquarters along the northeastern part of the mountain. Confident that he could not be dislodged, Ferguson fatuously awaited his doom. As to the exact number of men under his command there is some doubt. The official report of the American officers, based on papers found in the camp after the battle, puts it at 1,125; but it appears probable that some 200 had gone away in the morning on a foraging expedition, leaving, say, 900 in the fight. Of these about 100 were provincial rangers, gathered largely from New York and New Jersey. They were seasoned soldiers, a sort of corps d'élite, having seen much service and being especially expert with the bayonet. The rest of the corps was made up of Tory militiamen from the two Carolinas. They had been carefully drilled under Ferguson's direction and were formidable fighters.

"The mountaineers were well aware that Ferguson might yet change his mind and continue his retreat or that he might receive such a reinforcement from Cornwallis as would make him too strong to be safely attacked, so they resolved to deliver an instant blow. Having traveled so far and undergone such hardship in pursuit of their game, they were not in the least inclined to miss it at the very last.

"It was determined to march at once upon the camp and decide the conflict without further rest or refreshment. Each man was ordered to tie up his overcoat and blanket, throw the priming out of his pan, pick his touchhole, prime anew, examine his bullets, and see that everything was in readiness for the battle. While this was being done the officers agreed upon the general line of attack, which was to surround the eminence and make a simultaneous assault upon every part of the camp. The men were soon in their saddles and on their march.

"When not more than half a mile from Ferguson's camp and in full view of it, they dismounted, tied their horses, leaving a small guard with them, and proceeded on foot. To march as cavalry and fight as infantry was their uniform habit. On this particular occasion no other course would have been a possibility.

"Draper gives an excellent diagram, facing page 236, the careful study of which will be a great help to anyone wishing to understand the exact order of the battle. It shows that the regiments of Campbell and Shelby were thrown almost square across the southern end of the mountain, the former on the right and the latter on the left, and the two together constituting the center of the American Army. Joining Campbell on the right, and stretching thence to the east along the northern base of the mountain, Sevier, McDowell, and Winston, in that order, made up the right wing; while joining Shelby on the left, and stretching north along the southern base of the mountain, Williams, with several small detachments, Lacey, and Cleveland, in that order, made up the left wing. At the northern end of the mountain, Hambright and Chronicle completed the circle of investment, touching Winston on the right and Cleveland on the left, and thus making the escape of the British impossible, except by their breaking through the lines. To use different language, Campbell commanded in person the right center, Shelby the left center, Sevier the right wing, and Cleveland the left wing. Under these four the other officers took their places according to rank.

"Up to about this time, owing to the nature of the ground and the thick screen of forests, Ferguson had not become aware of the proximity of his foes. As soon, however, as he spied them he prepared for action. The facility with which he got his men into line is a great tribute to his ability. There can be no doubt that he was a true British bulldog, and had also a rare capacity for infusing his own spirit into those who fought under him. It is not belittling our countrymen to admit that they had found a foe worthy of their steel. On the contrary, it is enhancing their merit to say that they dared to precipitate themselves upon even such an antagonist.

"At length the several divisions started for the scene of action, marching two men deep, and led by their commanders. As the right and left wings had to make a considerable circuit to get into their assigned places in the line, they were delayed 10 minutes longer than had been expected. The first fire of the enemy was delivered, it appears, on Shelby's column, wounding some of his men, but he bade them keep quiet and press on till they were in position to give an effective return. Campbell opened the ball by pressing up the southern front of the mountain, his men loading and firing with great execution as they went. Before they reached the summit, however, they were met by De Peyster and his rangers, whom Ferguson had sent to check them, and were driven with considerable confusion to the bottom of the hill. Indeed, they did not stop until they had crossed a narrow hollow and climbed another elevation beyond it. Facing cold steel was an unusual experience with them, and naturally they recoiled from it. But with true courage they soon rallied to the call of their officers and again moved forward.

"The Rangers, meantime, had found other work to do, for Shelby also had pushed his line against the enemy immediately in his front. This bold action on his part drew the Rangers off to oppose him. He fought most bravely, as he always did. Bancroft describes him as 'a man of the hardest make, stiff as iron, among the dauntless singled out for dauntlessness.' But he, too, was compelled to retreat before the charging column.

"By this time the right and left wings were in place and pressing hard against the British position. When Campbell and Shelby, therefore, came on once more they found less difficulty than at first. Ramsey says that the next bayonet charge against them, though the Rangers were joined in it by a considerable number of the militiamen, who had butcher knives, was 'short and feebly executed.' This statement does not agree with the declarations of some who were present, but all the circumstances indicate that it is probably correct. Nevertheless, the fact that Campbell lost 14 men killed, of whom 13 were officers, shows how fierce the fighting was in his front. Shelby also lost heavily, though, strangely enough, no complete list of the killed and wounded in his regiment has ever been published. It is also a fact that both Campbell and Shelby were again driven down the declivity, though not as far as before. It was at this juncture that the report spread among the mountaineers that Tarleton was coming with his cavalry.

"It seemed to have a dispiriting effect, when the officers, including Col. Sevier, rode along the lines, calling upon the men to halt, assuring them that Tarleton was not there; and that if he were, they could also make him, like Ferguson's Rangers, turn his back and flee up the mountain. (Draper, p. 267.)

"The battle lasted for about an hour and every part of the army behaved admirably. Hambright and Chronicle, weak as they were in numbers, ventured to clamber up the northern end of the ridge, though Chronicle himself was killed at the very beginning of the onset, and several other of the officers and men before they reached the summit, and the rest were met and temporarily repulsed by the bayonet. Cleveland was a little late getting started on the left wing, but played a man's part to the end. On the right Sevier never wavered. A portion of his regiment on the left got mixed up with Campbell's men and were in the rushes from the front. But his main body was not charged. So says his son, Maj. James Sevier, who, as a boy of 16, fought through the whole battle, as did also an older son Joseph and his four brothers, Capt. Valentine and Robert and Privates Abraham and Joseph Sevier. Capt. Robert Sevier was mortally wounded toward the end of the engagement and died while on the way back to Watauga.

"As to which particular commander was the first to reach and hold the summit there has been some dispute, but the question would appear to be settled by the official report, signed a few days later by Campbell, Shelby, and Cleveland. It says:

"The troops upon the right, having gained the summit of the eminence, obliged the enemy to retreat along the top of the ridge where Col. Cleveland commanded, and where they were stopped by his brave men.

"The Hon. W. C. Preston quoted this passage many years later to show that Campbell was entitled to the distinction in question, in apparent oblivion of the fact that Campbell commanded the right center, while the whole of the right wing was commanded by Sevier, with Maj. McDowell and Winston under him. Draper fully confirms the view that I have expressed, page 226:

"Sevier's column at length gained the summit of the hill, driving the enemy's left flank upon his center.

"But, really, the whole matter is comparatively trivial, for before the end came all the different commands were on the summit and had girdled Ferguson's men, who were now huddled together on the northern end of the ridge with a ring of fire. In spite of his heavy losses and of the utter desperateness of his situation he refused to think of surrendering. Once and again his men hoisted white flags, but he promptly rode up and cut them down with his sword. It is said that even De Peyster begged him to submit to the inevitable, and that he profanely spurned the suggestion. At last, satisfied that all was lost, he rose in his stirrups and started to escape by dashing through his foes. But in the very act of doing so he was pierced by half a dozen rifle balls. 'It was in the region of Sevier's column,' says Draper, 'that he received his fatal shots.' De Peyster then promptly raised a white flag, but owing to some misunderstanding the firing did not cease till a few moments later.

"After some confusion the prisoners were disarmed and put under guard, Shelby and Sevier appearing instantly on the spot, and Col. Campbell a few moments later. There are positive statements from equally reputable men as to who received De Peyster's sword, some saying that it was Maj. Evan Shelby, and others that it was Col. Campbell. The only possible reconciliation of the contradiction is that it may have been handed first to Maj. Shelby and then passed on to Col. Campbell. Ferguson's sash, a magnificent one of red silk, and his long and heavy field glass, as well as his lieutenant colonel's commission, were brought off by Sevier, and are now in possession of the Tennessee Historical Society. Draper says that Sevier also got De Peyster's sword, page 308. Of this there must be some doubt. Each of the commanders secured some memento of the battle.

"The victory was complete. On the American side the loss was only 88 killed and wounded; on the British it was 334 killed and wounded and 648 taken prisoners. Thus closed a great day in the woods. A humane and Christian man must revolt from bloodshed, and yet he may well feel that resistance to cruel aggression is justified, and may admire without stint the heroism of the men who offer it.

"IN CONCLUSION.

"And now, gentlemen of the committee, I invite your attention to the claims with which I set out. Not saying a word to which any partisan of Col. Campbell could rationally object, I think I have shown, first, that he was not in any sense the originator of the expedition, but simply, after urgent and repeated solicitation, fell in with the plans of Shelby and Sevier; secondly, that, including both his own muster of troops and those that were brought to him by Arthur Campbell, he had under his command less than one-fourth of the men who were actually on the march or in the fight; thirdly, that the fact of his being appointed chief commander was not due to his superior military ability or experience, but was simply a piece of wise magnanimity on the part of the other colonels, and especially of Isaac Shelby, who really ranked him in seniority; fourthly, that even so his command was chiefly nominal, and that, after he received it, all the plans of the expedition, and finally the battle, were determined, not by him, but by a council of the colonels; fifthly, that while his part in the battle was honorable and courageous, it was not a whit more so than that of the other gentlemen associated with him. On what ground of right or justice, then, can he be elevated to a pinnacle of honor, while Sevier and Shelby, without whom certainly this chapter of our national annals would never have been made, are left to oblivion? If Virginia desires to put Gen. Campbell into such a lofty place, let her do it. But she ought not to ask the Federal Government to give its official sanction to such unhistorical pretensions.

"Nor is it, gentlemen of the committee, for Shelby and Sevier alone that I plead, but for McDowell, and Cleaveland, and Winston, and Lacy, and the other notable men who contributed so much to American independence on that fateful October 7, 1780, and for the subaltern officers and private soldiers who matched the courage of their leaders with a spirit that was equally as high. As a Tennessean, moreover, I ask justice for my native State and for the mother State of North Carolina. Kings Mountain, though not our first or last, was yet our chief point of contact with the Revolutionary War, and we cling to it. Why should Virginia, whose inheritance is so rich, desire to deprive us of our due share of the honors which our fathers fairly won? Sirs, we may safely claim to be a patriotic people. It is a source of pride to us that our ancestors, even in the lusty infancy of our great State, showed the metal of their manhood. When have Tennesseans ever failed to do so since? At the very time when Shelby and Sevier were leading their riflemen through the woods to South Carolina James Robertson and John Donelson were leading another band of Watauga folk 300 strong, who less than a year before had plunged 400 miles farther into the depths of the wilderness to found the fair city of Nashville, at that time the uttermost outpost of the Republic in the valley of the Ohio. At their first gathering on the banks of the Cumberland to form some sort of provisional government, they had nobly resolved that they would 'hold themselves liable for their ratable share of the expenses of the war for freedom.'

"In later years the descendants of these same men broke up the Creek Confederacy at the battle of the Horseshoe and liberated the Southwest from the further fear of savage wars. They went with Andrew Jackson to New Orleans, and put a glorious and emphatic period to our second struggle with England. They were present in large force with Houston and Crockett in the contest for Texas independence. At the outbreak of hostilities with Mexico, being called on for 4,000 men, Tennessee offered 27,000, and thus anew vindicated her ancient title of 'the Volunteer State.' In our civil strife nearly the whole body of our citizenship shouldered arms on one side or the other. The first congressional district, in which Sevier and Shelby both lived and from which their force was entirely recruited, put regiment after regiment into the Confederate Army and then furnished more volunteers for the Federal Army than any other congressional district in the United States.

"And once again, in 1898, when the Nation rose up in mortal combat against Spain, Tennesseans were in the front rank and eager to take part in the fray. In the Philippines and in Cuba the records show that they deported themselves in a manner worthy of the fathers from whose loins they had sprung.

"If, therefore, a memorial of any sort is to be erected on what was in 1780 our western border, it should be either at Sycamore Shoals, from which point the army set out, or at Bristol, on the line between the two States of Virginia and Tennessee and in the immediate vicinity of the home of Shelby; and when it is built it should stand not for one of the leaders only nor for one above the rest, but for all of them alike. In case any discrimination must be made, let it be made in the interest of those who conceived the great project in advance of the rest and made its execution a feasible thing.

"But I insist, Mr. Chairman, that such an event as that which I have been discussing ought not to be belittled by any cheap or common monument in a country village. It deserves to be glorified here in our National Capital. There is an epic grandeur, sirs, in the movement of our Anglo-Saxon stock across the Alleghanies and into the wide stretches of the Mississippi Valley, a grandeur that has never yet had adequate recognition. Does it not appeal both to our imaginations and to our hearts to think of the manly audacity of the pioneers, who, in their own strength, and without help from any external source, planted our civilization on that fertile soil, and with unequalled constancy guarded it against all intrusions till it grew to imperial dimensions? In that line of movements which has the majesty of a pageant stands out the Battle of Kings Mountain, not isolated and solitary in its character, but part of that great and orderly chain of sequences which has made the Middle West and the Southwest what they are to-day.

"Surely it would be most fitting to select some suitable site in this city of Washington, and rear on it a column of marble as a testimonial to the foresight and the fidelity of these men who in their day and generation 'had knowledge of all things to know what Israel ought to do,' and did not hesitate to take the lead in the doing of it. On this marble pillar let the names be carved of Campbell, and Shelby, and Sevier, and McDowell, and Cleaveland, and Lacy, and under them a group of riflemen clad in hunting shirts and armed with Dechard rifles. So may the Nation acknowledge a debt of gratitude which it can never fully repay."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 275. An act to make the special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals an assistant appraiser at the port of Boston;

S. 278. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give to the city of Newburyport, in Massachusetts, the United States customs building in that city and the land upon which it stands; and

S. 548. An act retiring Thomas Harrison, a clerk in the Naval Observatory, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 275. An act to make the special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals an assistant appraiser at the port of Boston; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

S. 278. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give to the city of Newburyport, in Massachusetts, the United States customs building in that city and the land upon which it stands; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

S. 548. An act retiring Thomas Harrison, a clerk in the Naval Observatory, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SWITZER, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KENT, for 2 weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. SLEMP, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a request for unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17936) to establish standard packages and grades for apples, and for other purposes, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I understood that by the approval of the Speaker bills similar to this were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. While it was my own opinion that the reference was perhaps wrong, I had no disposition to dispute with the Speaker about it, or question his decision, or appeal from it. Therefore I have answered letters in regard to the bill remaining before our committee, stating that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had taken jurisdiction of the subject and was considering other similar bills, and that I did not consider it necessary for two committees to be working on the same subject at the same time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is in session for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18956) for the support of the Army. The Clerk will report the bill.

A bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not weary the committee by a restatement of principles heretofore announced in a previous decision, but before ruling will advert to certain arguments advanced in the debate of Tuesday.

In that debate it was contended that in ruling on amendments, or provisions of a bill, under the Hohman rule, the Chair must look to the face of the paragraph, or amendment, to determine from such paragraph, or amendment, without extraneous aid or assistance, whether it will effect a retrenchment in expenditures. This is error. Speaker Kerr expressly ruled, and this ruling has been uniformly followed, that in determining whether an amendment will operate to retrench expenditures, the Chair can look to the pending bill, the specific section or amendment under consideration, the law of the land so far as applicable, and the parliamentary rules and practices of the House. Keeping these aids to a decision in mind, the Chair must determine whether the amendment, or included paragraph, will operate of its own force to retrench expenditures. The mere fact that the Chair may think that it is likely that a section, or an amendment will very probably save a considerable sum of money to the Treasury of the United States, is not a sufficient ground on which to hold that such an amendment, or section, is in order. In the view of the Chair, there must be something more. The amendment, or section, must necessarily bring about such a result, ex proprio vigore in order to be sustained.

Again the view was urged upon the Chair that if the conclusion of retrenchment from the operation of an amendment, or paragraph, is a matter of debate or of argument, if it requires evidence to establish such conclusion, then it does not appear from the provision itself, that it will work a retrenchment, and the same will not be in order. This again is error. Any proposition may be the subject of debate. Conceding that the Chair is limited to the inspection of the face of an amendment or paragraph, even then the proper conclusion to be drawn therefrom may be very appropriately debated. The opponents of the amendment may contend with vehemence that no result of retrenchment will attend its operation, while with equal vehemence and superior logic the friends of the amendment may be able to demonstrate that from its operation such a result would be an inevitable sequence.

Hence, the mere fact that the effect of a proposition may be assailed in debate will not operate to establish its invalidity or put it beyond the pale of the Holman rule. The true doctrine is that with or without discussion the Chair must be satisfied, as a condition precedent to holding an amendment to be in order, that the necessary effect of the same operating by its own force will be a retrenchment of expenditures in one of the three ways indicated by the rule.

The legislative provision which is under attack provides that hereafter all enlistments in the Army shall be for a term of five years. The present law provides that such enlistments shall be for a period of three years. In each case a man may reenlist at the expiration of his term. Provision is made by law for a bonus and an increase of pay on reenlistments. It is perfectly manifest, except under conditions so extraordinary that they may be eliminated from consideration, that under the five-year system of enlistment, compared with the existing three-year system, say, for a period of 15 years, there will be more reenlistments under the three-year than under the five-year system. Hence, the system that will reduce the number of enlistments will effect a retrenchment of expenditures under this head. It is contended, however, that certain other results will attend the five-year system which will make it on the whole a more expensive system than the other. But these results are purely speculative and problematical, and though vehemently asserted are with equal vehemence denied. In its first and immediate operation this provision will certainly effect a manifest and considerable retrenchment.

The Chair is not satisfied that there will be any other result, as a consequence of the five-year system, which will make this system on the whole more expensive, or even as expensive, as the three-year system. The Chair is satisfied as to the immediate retrenchment which will be afforded by this provision, and is far from being satisfied as to any other results. Standing alone this paragraph is in order. The next sentence of the section under consideration is in the form of a proviso, and provides, in substance, that hereafter no changes shall be made in the uniforms of officers and enlisted men, except such changes as may be made in the uniforms of enlisted men without loss or additional expense to the Government. This provision is designed to secure economy of administration, but looking to the same, to the bill, and to the law of the land so far as applicable, will this result be necessarily secured by this language standing alone? Does it require the department to do anything that it can not do, or that it may not do, under existing law? Non constat but that the department, in the absence of this provision, will pursue the very course which the proviso is intended to prescribe. It may decide of its motion, without compulsion, to make no changes in the uniform of soldiers, save such as can be made without loss or additional cost to the Government. Hence, it can not be said that the necessary compelling effect of this proviso is to secure retrenchment. This situation is not like the one presented in the preceding sentence. In that case a three-year term provided for by law, and in present operation, is proposed to be substituted by a five-year term. Hence a comparison can be made between the two systems. Unless the present law is changed the department has not volition save to live under the law of three-year enlistments as it is written. In the instance under present consideration the department is under no compulsion to make changes in uniforms that will cause loss or add expense to the Government. There is no way of demonstrating that in the future it will pursue such a course. Hence, as the Chair has said, there is no way of showing that this proviso will compel a course of action other and different from that which would be pursued in its absence.

Unless it can be reasonably shown that the course hereafter to be followed by the department will add cost and expense to the Government in the matter of uniforms, and that the adoption of the proviso is necessary to compel a different course and reduce that expenditure, then this proviso does not come within the principle of the Holman rule.

The Chair is not unmindful that many amendments are likely to be offered under this rule which are on the border line of order, requiring nice discrimination to determine the side of the line to which they appropriately belong. But the Chair must be satisfied that an amendment is in order to support a favorable ruling. In the present instance the Chair is of opinion that the latter portion of the section is not in order. The point of order is made to the whole section, and under the precedents, if sustained at all, it must be sustained in its entirety. The point of order is sustained to the whole section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That hereafter all enlistments in the Army shall be made for the term of five years, and for all enlistments which are accomplished five years shall be counted as an enlistment period in computing continuous-service pay.

Mr. PRINCE. I make the point of order against that section as offered.

The reason for my making the point of order is as follows: On page 400 of the House Manual, at the bottom of the page, I find this language pertaining to Rule XXI:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law, or the House members of any such commission, having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment.

This amendment is not offered by the committee. This is an amendment offered by an individual member of the Committee of the Whole to amend this bill. This is an amendment offered by an individual member of the Committee of the Whole and not an amendment to the bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law, or the House member of any such committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter.

To put it a little plainer, if I can, the objection to the amendment consists of three propositions:

First, this being an amendment offered by an individual Member in the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill does not put it under the rule. The rule says it shall be in order to amend the bill on the report of the committee. The committee has not made a report. True, it was in the original bill; but the paragraph was subject to a point of order, and the Chair has ruled that section entirely out of the bill. Therefore, the action of the committee was unauthorized, as evidenced by the ruling of the Chair when the point of order was made against the report of the committee. So far as section 2 is concerned, it promptly went out.

Now, the committee has not had another meeting, they have not even been called together for the purpose of considering whether they want the amendment made as a committee amendment or not, and therefore, not being a committee amendment, the Member has no right to offer it.

Neither does it come from any commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment. I insist again that under this rule the amendment brought in in the manner it is, without a report of the committee, is still subject to a point of order, and I confidently expect the Chair to rule it out.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have only to say that this amendment which I have offered was authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs because it was reported in the bill and is the action of the Committee on Military Affairs.

But apart from that, even if it had not been approved by the committee, it would be in order under the ruling of the Chair the other day on the question of the reduction of Cavalry regiments. So that in any event the amendment is in order. I do not care to take up any further time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, just a word on the point of order. Since this paragraph has been ruled out by the Chair a different question has been presented. Now, if this amendment is in order it must be in order under one of these three provisions. I read from from the rule:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States—

The bill does not purport to do either—by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States—

It does not purport to do that—or by reduction of amount of money covered by the bill.

It does not purport to do that, and could not do that, because the present enlistments are for three years, and the enlistment provided for in this amendment is five years. So that the effect, if it is to be one of economy, is at least three years in the future, and this appropriation, of course, covers only the fiscal year 1913. Therefore it does not effect a reduction of the amount of money covered by this bill. To be in order this amendment must come under one of these three provisions. Being an amendment presented by an individual member of the Committee of the Whole from the floor, it does not fall within the terms of the last provision of the rule, and is consequently out of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I agree fully with the ruling of the Chair just announced on both propositions involved in the section. I think if the provision for the five-year enlistment had been in the bill originally by itself it could be properly said that it would result in the retrenchment of expenditure, taking into consideration the undoubted fact that reenlistments do occur.

But the committee reporting the bill reported section 2 as an entirety, not merely the five-year enlistment, but the five-year enlistment with the proposition of the change of clothing. That was an entirety. That has gone out of the bill on a point of order, and the question now is whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia for the five-year enlistment is in order.

I concede, as far as I am concerned, that if this be a committee amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs it is in order, that committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter of the amendment and it being germane to the bill.

But I do not understand that the amendment now pending is offered as a committee amendment. Under the provisions of Rule XXI, the amendment is not in order as a reduction of the number or salary of the officers of the United States, because there is no reduction as there was due to the amendment relative to the Cavalry regiments, where the Chair held that cutting off a portion of the regiments of Cavalry did reduce the number of the officials of the United States. There is no reduction in the compensation of any person to be paid out of the Treasury. There is no reduction in the amounts of money covered by the bill. The provision, if in order at all, as I understand it, would be in order under the latter clause of the rule:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee * * * having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

I do not understand that this amendment is made upon the report of the committee at all. It is not offered as a committee amendment, nor has the committee reported upon this proposition standing by itself. The committee in the bill reported section 2 covering two propositions, and, in my judgment, it can not be said that the Chair can separate those two propositions and say that the committee reported upon one separately when the committee reported upon the two combined. I do not see how the amendment can be held in order unless it is offered as a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty with this situation. Section 2 is composed of two parts. While they are reported together, they have no sort of relation or connection with each other. They are not dependent the one upon the other. The merits of the one have no relation to the merits of the other. While embodied in one paragraph, they are as separate and distinct in their nature and intended operation as two things can well be. The Chair is required under the precedents to support a point of order directed to a whole section when a segregated portion of that section is, in the judgment of the Chair, not in order. But the balance or offending portion of the section has been eliminated in the amendment submitted. It may be fairly said of the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Virginia that it has been reported by the committee to this House since it was included in the committee's bill. But, while the amendment can be supported on the ground indicated, the Chair does not rest its conclusion on that ground alone. The ruling that was made by the Chair a few days since on the amendment respecting the Cavalry regiments would support the regularity and order of the amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] in his individual capacity. So that, from either point of view, the Chair thinks the amendment is in order. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The Chair will have read for the information of the committee the unanimous-consent agreement of last Tuesday regulating debate on this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in the event the Chair holds the paragraph in order, or if the paragraph be held out of order and the Chair holds any amendment I may offer to be in order, that all debate upon that paragraph or on that amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to two hours and a half, one hour and a quarter to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] and one hour and a quarter to be controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that in the contingency indicated by him debate shall be limited to two hours and a half, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the 10 minutes allowed me I can barely state the case we are asking the House to consider, and I shall therefore ask that I be permitted to proceed without interruption.

This is the first military appropriation bill that I have ever seen brought into this House in my 15 years of service in which any serious effort at economy has been made.

For years the people have cried out in vain for relief from the almost intolerable burden of military and naval expenses. They gave control of this body to the Democratic Party with the distinct understanding that it should reduce the cost of government. To my fellow partisans in this House I want to say that there rests upon them a solemn injunction, coming from what is for us the highest tribunal on earth, the American people, to practice the most rigid economy.

Your committee that was charged with the preparation of the bill for the support of the Army has earnestly and honestly endeavored to discharge that duty with fidelity to the people and the country. We believe that we have brought you a bill that will be in the interest of the Army and of the people who support the Army. We do not make the Army less efficient. Indeed, we have proposed legislation that will make it more efficient and at the same time lessen the burden of the people who maintain it.

Democrats ought to be proud, and should rejoice in the fact, that the first real, constructive military legislation that has been proposed in many years comes under the name of a great Democrat, the Hon. JAMES HAY, of Virginia. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Unlike the reorganization act of 11 years ago, this reduces expenses. But that is quite natural and to be expected. This is a Democratic measure; that was a Republican bill. That added largely to the cost of government; this will reduce it.

FIVE-YEAR ENLISTMENT.

Section 2 of the bill we are now considering proposes to make the enlistment period of the noncommissioned soldier 5 instead of 3 years. It is not a new or radical suggestion. An examination of the record discloses the fact that for 39 years of our history we have had a straight 3-year term of enlistment. For 80 years we have had a straight 5-year enlistment. For 3 years, say, or from July 28, 1866, to March 3, 1869, we had a peculiar law that enlisted the Artillery and Infantry for 3 years and the Cavalry for 5 years. Thus, as you see, for two-thirds of our history the enlistment term in the Army has been for 5 years, as proposed in this bill. It is not merely justified in history; it is supported by soldiers of experience with both plans.

The head of the recruiting service is The Adjutant General.

No man who knows Gen. Ainsworth will question his zeal in his profession, his high intelligence, or his ability to reach accurate conclusions from facts that come under his observation. Every Member of this House who has had business with The Adjutant General knows and must admit that he is perfectly familiar with all the details of his branch of the service. He is then, I take it, qualified to speak with authority and knowledge about this matter of recruiting for the Army.

He gives it as his opinion, based on observation and experience and from a study of the records, that it will not be materially more difficult to secure recruits under the 5-year enlistment period than it is under the shorter term.

He says, what we all know to be true, that the work of the recruiting officer is easy when times are hard, when employment is not readily found, and when wages are low. On the other hand, when there is plenty of work at good wages the soldier's trade is not so attractive. Everyone who has given the matter any attention knows that. It is he very primer of the business.

DESERTIONS.

It will be charged, I suppose, by those who oppose this reform that the longer enlistment period will increase desertion. In reply to that, I will say that the records disclose the fact that most desertions occur in the first year of service. Men who have served two or more years are not apt to desert. They are then familiar with the service, accustomed to discipline, adjusted to the environment of the soldier, and understand the penalty for that offense against the laws.

On that and other phases of the question, hear what Col. Murray, a soldier of 34 years' experience, who has had long service as a recruiting officer, has to say.

The chairman asked him if it would make recruiting more difficult if the enlistment period was extended. He said:

I do not think it would affect it one way or other. * * * I find a majority of the men have not given any attention to the length of service. There are not many men over 25 years of age in their first enlistment. The majority are from 18 to probably 22 * * * and they do not question the period of enlistment.

On the question of reenlistment he said that men who had been in the Army for 5 or 6 years were accustomed to the service and apt to reenlist.

As to desertions, Col. Murray gave it as his opinion that there would be fewer under a 5-year enlistment period.

Maj. Thomas B. Dugan, with 28 years of honorable service and who has been engaged in recruiting for the Army, said that, in his opinion, the lengthening of the enlistment period would not affect his work of getting recruits.

He confirmed what other officers say about desertions being in the first or second year of service, and added that "the longer the period of service the less should be the desertions."

Maj. Kenly, who has had nearly 23 years of service, confirmed what Col. Murray and Maj. Dugan had said.

These things that I only have time to refer to you can see in the hearings before the committee. There is also a mass of other testimony of the same sort from officers of experience in the shape of telegrams and letters to the chairman of the committee.

With the exception of The Adjutant General, who is the chief of all the recruiting service in the United States, I recall no one whose testimony was taken and who supports this bill who has not had long experience with troops as company or regimental officer.

ECONOMY.

Just a word, Mr. Chairman, as to the economy of this measure.

It will make a large annual saving in the consolidated supply corps. The Chief of Staff, Gen. Leonard Wood, gave unstinted and almost unqualified indorsement to that feature of the bill.

He does not believe in the five-year enlistment period that we have proposed, but would not, I dare say, seriously claim that it will not make a large annual saving. That, in a great measure, is a simple calculation.

Gen. Whipple, the Paymaster General of the Army, asserts in the hearings, on page 81, that the effect of lengthening the period would be "a large saving." On length-of-service pay he says the saving would be approximately $750,000 a year, on bonus for reenlistment about $40,000 a year, and for travel pay on discharge $300,000 a year. That makes the very respectable total of $1,150,000 that can be saved each year. But, in addition to that, he says the saving on the clothing allowance would probably be $800,000 a year.

Gen. Aleshire, an uncommonly well-informed officer, a man who is perfectly familiar with all the details of the great business branch of the War Department, puts the annual saving on the clothing allowance under this bill at $859,107, basing his figures on an army of the size of that we now have. I may say, in passing, that Gen. Aleshire did not, in this calculation, take into consideration the Philippine Scouts; and on the clothing allowance for them, which is something less than half of that given the American soldiers, we would save some forty or fifty thousand dollars a year more.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I must decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

In the item of transportation, principally the transportation of recruits to stations to which they have been assigned and of applicants for enlistment, he estimates a yearly saving of $198,272.

The claim of the chairman in his report that there would come from the longer enlistment period a yearly saving of $2,230,766 is entirely warranted in the testimony of these experts, the Quartermaster General and the Paymaster General.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is so fair, it is so clearly in the interest of the people, and so manifestly promotes the efficiency of the Army that I am surprised that it should have opposition among the Representatives of the people. I thought at one time that we might even have a unanimous report from the committee. I overestimated love of country and underestimated the influence of partisanship. But I do not complain. I merely appeal to Members who think that the taxpayers are entitled to consideration to take advantage of this opportunity to do something for the man who pays the bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, so that it may be considered as pending and, if it is in order, that it may be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Provided, That in time of peace any enlisted man other than one serving in the Philippine Islands, whose service and training has been satisfactory, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, after two years' service in any enlistment period and upon his own application, be granted a furlough, without pay or allowance, to the end of his enlistment, and such enlisted man thus furloughed shall be held for no military duty except in time of war, and shall not be counted as part of the enlisted force provided by law."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 17 minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, sections 2 and 3 of the pending bill especially concern the enlisted men, who largely bear the physical burden of the service in time of peace, and immeasurably bear that burden in time of war.

While section 3 would deny to the commissioned officer, as to the enlisted man, certain valued benefits for service in the Philippines, the pay of the commissioned officer would be in no wise decreased when serving in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, or in the United States, but section 2 would reduce the continuous pay of the enlisted man wherever he may serve.

It would mean to enlisted men of 10 years' service a reduction of $228; of 15 years' service, $324; of 20 years' service, $468; and, unless otherwise provided through later legislation or by departmental order, would mean a reduction of 40 per cent in reenlistment clothing allowance.

The law of four years ago handsomely increased the pay of the commissioned officer of every rank, advanced the pay of the private soldier from $13 to $15 per month to $18 per month on reenlistment and to $21 per month on second reenlistment. It is now proposed to compel him to serve into the eleventh year, instead of into the seventh year, as now, to receive this $21 per month; and if he is ever to receive the maximum pay of $25 per month he must serve into the thirty-first year, instead of into the twenty-first year, as at present.

It is also proposed to deprive the enlisted men of double-time credit for service in the Philippines. These two propositions taken together make too large a dose for one time.

Sections 2 and 3 ought to be introduced as a bill, to discourage the reenlistment of the best and most suitable men for the service.

I quite understand and agree with the desire that all men do not reenlist, and in this view believe the three-year term is far better than a five-year term for weeding out the men not suitable for continued service. It is, however, of extreme importance that the men of approved character, efficiency, and adaptability to reenlist and the noncommissioned strength be fully maintained at all times.

No soldiers in the world surpass the noncommissioned men of our Army. All commissioned officers of field and frontier service feelingly testify that our long-service sergeants always have contributed largely to the success and the honor of the Army of the United States.

We shall always require such men, and in abundant measure, if in time of need thousands upon thousands of raw recruits are to be guided in the ways of life in the open and there taught that a sound stomach and a clean, well-kept body is absolutely essential in the making of a reliable soldier.

I do appeal for the enlisted man, because I know of the burden he bears, and that always, when in action, he cares for his wounded and helpless commissioned officer, even though he himself may later lie where he falls. And that enlisted men do often lie where they fall is silently confirmed by more than 50,000 graves of unknown enlisted dead in this land of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, rarely indeed is the individual enlisted man named in history. He is referred to as in the mass of those who served with Washington or Scott, with Grant or Lee or Sheridan, or with Stonewall Jackson in the Army of the Valley.

But, all the same, his marvelous endurance, heroic fortitude, his suffering and infinite sacrifice, and his splendid valor inspired the men of a later day—of 1898—in the South and West, East and North alike, to spring from all walks of life to serve as enlisted men in support of the flag—our flag—that droops in graceful folds above the Speaker's chair! [Applause.]

I know of a home in the Northwest where, on the kitchen wall, hangs a muzzle-loading rifle that was carried by the head of that house when he served as a private soldier in the Army of the Union. Beneath the old Springfield rests a breech-loading rifle that was borne by the son of that house when he served as a private soldier in the command of Joe Wheeler at Santiago.

And I know of a home where the magnolia blooms in perfect purity, a home where, on the antlers in the hall, rest a saber and the spurs of one who responded as a private soldier to the clarion call of Jeb Stewart. Beneath the antlers is a breech-loading rifle of the same pattern as in the other home. It was borne by a son of this house when he served as a private soldier in the command of Nelson A. Miles at the taking of Porto Rico.

It was a little war—the contest of 1898—and a costly one, but priceless in the fact that the men, the enlisted men of that day, closed forever the crimson chasm that for 30 years had yawned between the sections.

In tribute to our enlisted men of the present and of the past, who now serve in peace or have served in war, can we not defer consideration of this enlistment proposition until another year has passed?

The Secretary of War has given his word that prior to the next session, if not during this, he will present a new plan for enlistment now being worked out by the officers of the War College and the General Staff, a plan to provide, probably, for a five-year term of enlistment, divided, perhaps, between three years of service with the colors and two years in a civil-life reserve.

Why not wait on the word of the War Secretary and make no change whatever at this time in the term of enlistment. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I release the balance of my time.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded back 7 minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

Mr. McKellar. Mr. Chairman, being a new member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I am not as familiar with the workings of the Army as I ought to be, but there are certain features of that part of the bill referring to the five years' enlistment period concerning which I desire to say a few words.

I want to say at the outset that I favor most heartily the entire bill on two general grounds. The first is that as a whole, in my judgment, the bill makes for greater efficiency in the Army, and, second, that the saving is enormous, amounting, as I am informed, to some $8,000,000 per year. The Chief of Staff, in his testimony before the committee, indorsed several of the legislative features of this bill, but the one under particular consideration now he did not indorse; and yet I think he made statements concerning it from which it is easy to see that a change in the period of enlistment will make a very much more efficient service. I quote as follows from page 56 of the hearings from the testimony of Gen. Wood:

The Paymaster General pays out practically $1,000,000 a year for clothing undrawn. Our men are very liberally paid, splendidly quartered, and liberally provided with pension in case of disability, and there is no occasion whatever for such a clothing allowance; and the fact that $1,000,000 a year, in round numbers, is paid out to men for clothing allowed them, but not drawn, shows the extravagance of the present procedure.

Another objection to short enlistments has been in the matter of travel pay allowed to the place of original enlistment on reenlistment. This amounts, in round numbers, to $1,000,000 a year, and a very large portion of it—probably more than half or in the neighborhood of half—is paid for travel which is not made at all, and, I believe, really constitutes a great injustice to the Government.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield—

Mr. McKellar. Mr. Chairman, I greatly regret, but I have only 12 minutes—

Mr. PRINCE. I was only going to say in regard to travel pay not being used that it would have to be used if you recruited and brought him there.

Mr. McKellar. I will give the gentleman what Gen. Wood says about it:

For instance, a man enlists in New York and he goes out to the Philippine Islands. He gets while there two years' credit toward retirement for every year of service. He has an increase of 20 per cent in his pay. He reenlists, we will say, in Manila, and is immediately given travel pay and allowances to New York. He reenlists again in Manila and does not travel a foot, but he gets that pay. We ought to eliminate all travel pay when no travel takes place.

And again—

The real object of this bill is economy, and there is no one more anxious than I am to cut down the present extravagance [p. 66].

And again, speaking of the present system of reenlistment under a five-year period instead of three years, Gen. Wood said:

You can imagine the size of the pension list, the size of the retired list, and the inefficiency of this veteran organization. They would be splendid for park police, but for active military duty they would not be worth their salt [p. 66].

Now, it will be seen by Gen. Wood's own statements, he not only considers the system at present in vogue extravagant beyond degree, but he says that if we keep up a veteran organization—that is, if we continue to allow men to reenlist, and especially under a five-year period—this veteran organization would not be worth their salt. I do not believe that Gen. Wood is correct about this. I am sure that the present system is extravagant, as he says, and this bill seeks to make it economical; but I disagree with Gen. Wood about the veteran organization being worthless, and I believe that I can prove it by Gen. Wood's own language at the hearings. His remedy for this trouble is as follows:

In both the Militia and Regular Army we have got to come to a long enlistment, but with only a short term of service with the colors. For instance, supposing that we had an enlistment of 10 years, of which 3 years are active years with the colors and 7 years are years of obligation—obligation only to come to the colors in time of war and during the 7 years to come to two or three maneuver periods of 8 days each [p. 62].

And again, to further describe his proposed system:

The men are regularly enlisted, and they have taken an oath to come in in time of war. They would be required to keep The Adjutant General of the Army informed as to their addresses. As a return you pay them whatever you think is proper. I should say $1.50 or $2 a month. They make a monthly report or quarterly report of their addresses. They are given entire freedom of travel, etc. It is a system which pertains, so far as following the men up, in practically all the foreign armies. You would have the United States marshals, or any other officials you might designate, furnished with a list of available men who are under obligation to render military service in their district [p. 63].

And again:

We keep the noncommissioned officers, artificers, and the higher class of privates, and that is about 25 per cent. It would be a great misfortune if we should reenlist every man [p. 66].

The statement has been made on the floor of this House during this debate that by departmental orders reenlistments have been discouraged by the War Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the gist of argument of the Chief of Staff on this question? It is that if men are kept in the Army by reenlistment they are not worth their salt, except the noncommissioned officers and a few privates. But if this other worthless 75 per cent is given only a three years' training in the Army and then turned out among the body of people with the duty to come back to three maneuvers of eight days each in seven years, then they become a splendidly organized fighting force. In other words, his position is that if you keep this 75 per cent in the Army and train them and season them they are not worth their salt; but if you turn them out on the body of the people, where they may engage in other pursuits of life, where they may change their relationship in life, such as getting married, becoming the fathers of families, becoming interested in other greater or less affairs of civil life, and where they soon forget their training, that they become thereby a great fighting force simply by attending a maneuver about every two years. We on this side of the Chamber say that this is not decent nonsense.

Mr. AMES. Will my colleague permit an interruption?

Mr. McKellar. Will the gentleman kindly not interrupt now? I have such a little time. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how that is, and I do not know that this committee had to go to the War Department to bring in a bill for a reform of an army that the Chief of Staff solemnly states is most extravagant and that 75 per cent of the soldiers of that army are inefficient. And I hope the time will never come when men who come here by the suffrages of the people have to go to a department before they can bring in a bill for the reform of a department of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In this connection I desire to say that I have heard it stated on this floor a number of times during the debate on this bill that our committee did not get the permission, if I may so call it, of the War Department to bring in this bill—that we would not advise with the War Department before bringing in this bill. Why, Mr. Chairman, that may or may not be true. As a matter of fact, this committee did advise with the leading officers of the Army before reporting this bill; but it is said that the War Department is about to perfect a plan for reorganization of the Army and that we ought to have waited for such a plan, they being experienced in the matter. Why, Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced almost a year ago. The Chief of Staff came before the committee and heartily indorsed many of the features of the bill, notably the creation of the supply department and the consolidation of other great departments of the Army, and indorsed them fully. The department had all the time since to introduce a plan of reorganization, and yet no plan has been introduced, and the nearest that we have to it is the so-called plan for the creation of an Army reserve—that is to say, that soldiers shall not be allowed to reenlist, that the term shall be kept at three years and a reserve created.

Where is that plan? The present system has been in vogue for 11 years. The Chief of Staff or the War Department have not brought in any plan yet. Our distinguished chairman introduced this bill last summer or last spring, I believe it was, and they have had all that time. You gentlemen have had that time to bring a plan to reorganize the Army; have you done it? The only semblance of it is the reserve arrangement that has been suggested by Gen. Wood, and to which I have just referred.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman give the reference to that, please, while he is passing from it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will pass the statement over to the gentleman.

In two-thirds of the time during our national history we have had a five-year enlistment period. Shortly after the Republican Party went into power (1861) they established a five-year period of enlistment, and it was maintained with a few short exceptions until 1894, when a Democratic administration changed it to three years, and thus it has remained ever since.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to secure that permission from the gentleman in charge of the time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is very kind, but I do not feel I ought to trespass upon the program which has been made, and I will ask unanimous consent to conclude my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, is not there a general order made in reference to this entire bill? I understand so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed. The Chair is informed at the desk that no such order as that has been made.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I think the order was made at the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, that order was made in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not informed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the hearings a great many Army officers appeared, and in addition to that the chairman of our committee got the opinion of 277 officers outside of the city of Washington, with the result that over two-thirds of those officers were in favor of the five-year enlistment period. These officers had served under both terms of enlistment, and Gen. Wood, when he appeared before the committee, was asked by the chairman:

Do you know of any officer of long service, who has served both under the five-year system and the three-year system, who prefers the three-year system to the five-year system?

Gen. Wood. I know a good many officers who have been in the service since before the Spanish War—yes; there is not an officer in the General Staff with whom I have spoken who is not in favor of the short period.

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking of officers outside of the staff.

Gen. Wood. As to the older officers I do not know. I have spoken with few of them (p. 60).

A large majority of the officers that the chairman made inquiries of also stated that it would be just as easy to recruit under the five-year enlistment as under the three-year period. Now, it is true what Gen. Wood says, that a good soldier can be made within 12 months and a good Cavalry officer within 15 months (p. 59).

But it will be seen from an examination of the replies of the 277 officers from whom inquiries were made that they who have had actual experience in recruiting and serving with the men in the field, two-thirds of these Army officers say that it would take from two to three years to make a good soldier. Now, Mr. Chairman, is it possible that as soon as you get men trained and fit for service in the Army that it is a good policy to discharge them? Why have any organized Army at all if that reasoning is correct? Why not simply have schools for the training of officers and men established in various parts of the country with a three-year course and do away with the expensive military establishment we now have? If privates become better soldiers by disuse and by following other avocations, why would not the same rule apply to officers? If old soldiers who are in the service every day are not worth their salt, how much are old soldiers who are in the reserve, with a maneuver every two years, worth? But Gen. Wood says that there is no more difficult situation in the Army than a company filled with old soldiers (p. 66).

Is it possible that advancing years only come to those serving in the Army? Is time blocked and the clock set back when an ex-soldier gets into Gen. Wood's reserve? Of course, should these reserves ever be called upon to serve in time of war all of them would at once become young and Gen. Wood would not have the difficult situation of old reserves to deal with. Gen. Wood says that wars are mostly fought with young men. Then why have a reserve, the greater portion of which must necessarily soon be old? So that we find the proposal of the Chief of Staff, which calls for an enlistment of three years, 75 per cent of the men not to reenlist, but to go out in the body of the people, is a chimerical proposition. Once turn them loose and allow them to go in other walks of life we would have more difficulty in getting them back than we do now in getting new recruits. They would so lose the benefit of their former training and would be very little, if any, better than the new recruit. If they had become old, and with all due deference to the Chief of Staff, men can become old whether they serve in the Army or whether they serve as a reserve, and if they have become old, then, in the words of the Chief of Staff, they are not worth their salt. On the other hand, take the five-year enlistment period. We can get under it recruits just as easily, according to the opinions expressed in the hearings. In the next place, we get two years of additional good service from the soldier after he is trained. In the next place, it saves the Government nearly $2,225,000 per year. In the next place, it makes our Army, though small, an army of trained veterans, who can be called on at any time for any military service. If we want to spend more money in increasing the size and efficiency of the Army, let us build up our National Guards. In them we would get a higher class of men. We will get a younger set of men. We will get a more patriotic set of men than we would by creating a reserve out of ex-soldiers of the Army. It seems at first that our friends, including the War Department, were in favor of this reorganization bill; even my distinguished friend, Mr. KAHN, asked Gen. Wood some questions indicating that he thought at first that a five-year enlistment period was the better. The truth is, we all realize something should be done to build up the Army in efficiency and to economize in its cost, and I think in these views the gentlemen on the other side believe that in a way the legislative features of this bill will be in the right direction.

But it is said that we ought not to legislate in an appropriation bill. For my part I believe that we should. It is a condition and not a theory that presents itself to us. We all know that, the Senate being Republican and the Executive being Republican, we can not pass this bill unless it is included in the general appropriation bill, and I do not think that we ought to be too technical in the method by which so great a reform can be effected.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stated recently in the public prints that our friends on the other side charge us with striking down the Army and cutting off the Navy because we decline to build two more battleships, and because we decide to dispense with five regiments of Cavalry.

Mr. Chairman, already we have heard of the good effect of our action as to battleships. The great English statesman, Lloyd George, has already indicated a desire to follow our good example. In my judgment we have got the best fighting force on the seas to-day, though it is not the largest. In all our history we have never met a defeat. I am not one of those who believe that the present Navy is unable to meet any emergency to which it may be subjected. In the War of 1812, in the Civil War, in the War with Spain our fleets did all and more than was expected of them. Our Navy to-day is the pride of our national life. In my judgment we have got the best gunners on the sea, and I for one would not fear to put our Navy against any navy on the sea, for I believe whenever the test comes the matter of numbers will make no difference, but it will be the valor, and the courage, and the marksmanship of the American seamen that will bring honor to the American flag wherever it floats. And now, as to the abolition of the five regiments of Cavalry: We have heard of the splendid cavalry charges that have been made on historic battle fields; but, Mr. Chairman, the world of warfare has progressed beyond the cavalry charge. There is doubtless no more useless implement of war than the sword and bayonet, and the horse, and the pistol. Whatever we think of the splendor of their achievements in the past, we must all bow to the more splendid achievements of science and genius in the manufacture of modern firearms. Why, there is no more sense in keeping up a large Cavalry force than there is in furnishing staves and rocks and slings for our Infantry. Instead of striking down the Army we are simply weeding out those things that are useless, those things that are extravagant, those things that are of no importance; and in the best way that this committee knows how we are seeking to upbuild the Army, so that in the years that are to come, if they are peaceful, no harm will be done; if we have war, then we will have the most improved machinery of destruction, the most up-to-date method of slaying our fellow men, that is known among mankind in civilized warfare. I say it does not speak well for the general of the Army who admits that the short term of enlistment alone costs in two items only the enormous sum of $2,000,000 per year, without any benefit to the service, and who asserts that under the short term of enlistment 75 per cent of the soldiers become not worth their salt, and who, though he has had many years to correct the trouble, has developed or submitted no plan for its correction, and who has had since last May to formulate a bill of his own, but he has not done so—I say it does not speak well for him or anyone else in authority to talk about this bill striking down the Army. It is a good bill. It is constructive legislation of the most important type. It cuts off useless expenditure. It builds up the service. It is a forward movement in putting our Army on the same high plane with our splendid Navy, and it should pass for the good of the service and for cutting off the extravagance and drains pointed out by the Chief of Staff. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the five-year enlistment, as provided for in this bill, and I am in favor of leaving it as it is, and I propose to support the amendment which has been offered for the three-year enlistment. Now, one thing seems to be pretty well settled during the course of this debate, and that is that the Army has been made for years a political football to advance the interests of statesmen in different parts of the United States. From the debate on the abolishment of Army posts when the department had recommended the abandonment of 41 posts, it was contended upon this floor that they ought to be maintained, or, rather, had been maintained, for the reason the political advantage of certain gentlemen would be enhanced. This was the logical deduction to be drawn from the arguments made. This is the true situation in regard to that important matter. The department recommended their abolishment, and it knew whether or not they were necessary or essential to the welfare of the country and the handling of the Army. Should this important department be made to suffer for the advancement of anyone's political fortunes? For one, I am opposed to use it for any such purpose.

The three-year enlistment provision was adopted, tried, and worked out satisfactorily, and now, for some reason, I know not why, it is proposed to change that term of enlistment to five years. It has been said in debate on this bill and on other appropriation bills that we ought to follow the advice of the heads of the department. Yet on this very question 85 per cent of the skilled men, the high officers in the military service, advise us to stand by the three-year enlistment and about 13 or 14 per cent advise us to change it to five years. Should we follow the advice of the many or shall we follow the advice of the few? It is merely a disorganization instead of completing an organization. Why should we have the three years? To encourage the patriotism of the country. The Standing Army is not alone able to defend the country; it is only the nucleus for the formation of a great army; and if war, either from within or without, should come, you would get the defense of the Union from the volunteers from the civil walks of life.

Let these men who have served three years—as many of the men from the farm, from the shop, from the store, and from the factory would like to enlist—serve three years and retire to their private employment, and whenever an attack should come, either from within or without, as heretofore you would find them organizing volunteers for the defense of the Union, and the great number who would take up the defense would be made up from volunteers from civil life. To my right sits one of the gallant generals of a great war, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. When the necessity came for his services to his country he volunteered and did not go into the service from a military school. So it is these young men, who had seen service, who in time of war, if war should break out, would organize the volunteers at the earliest date possible for the defense of the Union. [Applause.] But if you make the enlistment five years, very many of the young men who would enlist for three years would not enlist for five, and the country would be denied their service. Then, in case of war, the people would be deprived of their experience.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy all the time that has been allowed to me by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], but I want to speak to this committee as one of its members who has had some experience in military affairs. From early childhood I have been associated with the Army of the United States, and for more than two years and a half served as a commissioned officer in that Army. Part of the time I served as a recruiting officer. I want to say to my colleagues in this House that if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and require a five-years' enlistment you will have to look to foreigners to fill up the United States Army in the future. You will not have the patriotic young Americans who will go into the service for five years that will now go in for three years. As far as I am concerned, I believe three years is too long an enlistment, and that the term of enlistment should be only two years. Then we would have the best of American citizenship in the Army, and if they would not reenlist they could go back home, be good citizens, join our National Guard, and serve as a reserve force in time of war.

Mr. Chairman, this subject has been handled by members of the Committee on Military Affairs on both sides who are much better informed on the bill than I am, but I simply appeal to the members of this committee to lay aside any prejudice they may have and vote for the best interests of the Army of the United States and citizens of this country and defeat the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] by leaving the term of enlistment three years as it is now. I thank you. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentlemen in the House who are not members of the Military Committee will not care very much for our individual opinions on this subject, but would like to know the main points in the evidence upon which this bill has been framed.

I wish, therefore, in a very few moments to call attention to the evidence given by Gen. Wood in favor of the short enlistment and the evidence of Gen. Ainsworth in favor of the longer enlistment. I will not give you my conclusion, but I will give you the actual testimony. I will read from page 129 of the hearings. I ask the gentlemen on this side of the House who seem to have some doubt on this subject to listen to the record.

In discussing the short enlistment, Gen. Wood said:

It is, perhaps, the most expensive form of military establishment which we could maintain.

The most expensive form is the short enlistment. Is not this truly the military standpoint, that it makes no difference what the system costs, none whatever, because they admit that the short system is the most expensive that we could have?

Then, turning to what Gen. Ainsworth says on the other side of the question, I call your attention to a colloquy in which I had the honor to take part. Gen. Ainsworth said (p. 159):

The result of shortening our term of enlistment or of keeping it as now fixed by law, but with the adoption of a prohibition against the re-enlistment of privates, would result in filling the Army largely with immature young men of short service to the exclusion in great measure of the mature, seasoned, experienced, and capable private soldier of two or more enlistments that most, if not all, experienced company commanders are so solicitous to obtain and retain, and that has proven so valuable to the Army in a thousand difficult or dangerous situations in the past. This exchange of mature and seasoned soldiers of relatively long service for immature and unseasoned soldiers of short service and little experience could not fail to impair seriously the physical efficiency of the enlisted personnel of the Army.

And immediately afterwards he shows the results upon the health of officers and soldiers, untrained and inexperienced, who go to the Philippines. He says:

The following table shows very clearly, for a period of seven years and for the year 1900, the latest for which data are available, the great disparity between the older and younger soldiers in the matters of losses from disease and of impairment of effectiveness by reason of disease:

Age of soldiers in relation to losses from disease for a period of 7 years.

[Total losses from disease per 1,000 strength.]

19 years and less.....	27.95
20 to 24 years.....	17.35
25 to 29 years.....	15.09
30 to 34 years.....	14.42
35 to 39 years.....	14.64
40 to 44 years.....	24.11
45 to 49 years.....	26.23

In other words, the more trained, the more mature, and the older the soldiers are that you send to the Philippines the less proportion die of disease. It is merely a question of humanity, and for that reason, if for nothing else, you should not send untrained soldiers to the Philippines.

Now, what is the main argument? The main argument is this: That it takes eight months of travel to and from the Philippines, four months going and four months coming, and two years must be spent in the Philippines, because our service in the Army is two years in the tropical countries, and if you take a man who enlists for three years, and he has got to go to the Philippines, in order that he may get back within his three-year enlistment period he must do it while he is a young and immature soldier, with the percentages of disease to which he may be liable, and to which I have referred, staring him in the face. On the other hand, if you have a five-year enlistment, you can send a man over to the Philippines who has had two years of previous training and is therefore less liable to disease.

If you do not do this, what is the alternative? You train a soldier here for six months and send him to the Philippines and then discharge him and pay his expenses back. It is in avoiding that that the saving comes in. [Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, one of the most reprehensible practices of lawmaking is the incorporation of important legislative provisions in a general appropriation bill. For many years that method of procedure was strictly prohibited by the rules of the House, but this Congress has so changed the rules that the most important legislative provisions may be included in a general supply bill if there appears on the face of the provision a reduction of public expenses, however trifling. The great supply bills must be enacted every year or the vital functions of the Government will be arrested. Wise legislative procedure would keep out of appropriation bills everything except provisions for carrying on the operations of the Government. General measures should be separately considered and decided on their merits. In the present instance the bill contains important and elaborate legislative provisions, radically affecting the very character of the standing Army, and by every consideration of safe and orderly procedure those provisions should have been reported and considered apart from the appropriation bill. They are opposed by the President, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff of the Army, and by others whose positions make them primarily responsible for the administration and discipline of the Army.

If this bill should pass both Houses of Congress and go to the President for approval or disapproval, he could not disapprove the objectionable features of the bill without vetoing the entire measure, and however unwise or obnoxious these features might appear to him he could not veto them without disbanding the entire Army. The committee that reported the pending bill could have submitted the legislative provisions independently, so they could have been considered and determined upon their own merits. It is a safe assumption that when such important matters of legislation are embodied in a general appropriation bill, standing alone they do not possess sufficient virtue to command the support of Congress. Many Members of this body are opposed to those provisions, but they will not be free to vote against them on the final passage of the bill, because they can not do so without voting against the entire bill, and provision must be made for the support and maintenance of the Army. Whatever merit the change in the House rules authorizing such legislation on appropriation bills may possess it is more than offset by the reprehensible method of tacking provisions of questionable merit on those bills. I warn the House and the country that discredit and scandal are the inevitable result of such procedure.

This pending amendment proposes to change the term of enlistment for Regular Army soldiers from three to five years. That change is proposed against the objections and over the protest of the officers of the Government who are responsible for the efficiency of the Army. I have carefully read the elaborate report of the committee accompanying this bill and have failed to find any substantial reason to justify the proposed change. The report seems to make Gen. Wood, the Chief of Staff, the target for shafts of sarcasm and ridicule because of his objection to the change, and yet the experience of the Government ever since its organization has been in accord with his grounds of objection. It is much more difficult to secure enlistments of young men in the Regular Army under a five-year period of service than it is under a three-year period. Furthermore, a better class of soldiers can be secured for a three-year term than for a five-year term. Many young men are willing to enlist for three years for the discipline and experience it would afford them, but who would not withdraw themselves from civil pursuits for a term of five years. The term of enlistment in the Regular Army was originally fixed at three years, and since then it has been changed to five years and back to three years nine different times.

Until 1901 the maximum strength of the Regular Army was 25,000, and yet it was difficult to keep it recruited up to that standard under five-year enlistments. The last period of the five-year term began in 1869, and the difficulty of securing volunteers was so serious that the Government was compelled to provide in the contract of enlistment a condition under which every volunteer soldier could practically procure a discharge from the Army at the end of three years' service by simply requesting it. In 1894 Congress, in view of the experience of the Government under the five-year term, provided that all enlistments should be for three years only, and that is the law now.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman ought to be apprised of the exact condition. Up to 1890 the enlistment was for a five-year period flat. Then it was changed, because of the large number of desertions, to a three-year period with the option of continuing for two years if the soldier desired to do so, and then in 1894 the law was changed so as to make it three years flat. But from 1868 to 1890 it was five years.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My understanding of the reasons that resulted in the change and the inclusion of the option during the last two years of withdrawing from the Army was largely because of the difficulty of securing enlistments in the first place. Almost every Army officer from whom I have heard upon the question of enlistments, or upon the question of desertions, has seemed to be of the opinion that the desertions occurred principally during the first year of service.

Mr. KAHN. True.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Since 1894 the term has been three years, and that is the law to-day. I can not discover any adequate reason for its change, particularly against the objections and over the protests of those who carry the responsibilities for the administration and discipline of the Army.

The Secretary of War now recommends a three-year term of active service without reenlistment, except as to noncommissioned officers, with the condition that volunteers should be subject to the call of the Government in time of war for an additional period of four or six years. The purpose of that plan is to create a reserve of trained and disciplined citizen soldiers who would be available for military service in the exigency of war, but who, in the meantime would be undisturbed in civil pursuits. That recommendation has many commendable features and it is certainly worthy of thoughtful consideration. It would be a rare occurrence for a young man, who desired to serve in the Regular Army for three years, to be deterred from enlistment by the condition that he would be subject to call in defense of the country at any time during an additional period of four years if the Government should be involved in war. In the first place, the probability of war is so remote as to be a negligible consideration; and, in the second place, the average citizen who has had military training would willingly respond to the country's call for aid when its honor and prestige were at stake.

The report of the committee treats the Secretary's recommendation as utterly impracticable and altogether visionary. It is based chiefly upon the opinions of line officers and particularly "company commanders" in opposition to the reserve plan. Good Army officers are apt to be influenced more or less by an unconscious professional bias in their opinions about matters of public defense. They are most likely to view the situation from a professional standpoint and not from that of the general public. They keep in view the efficiency of the Regular Army as a fighting machine. On the other hand the recommendation of the Secretary of War involves the broad policy of the efficiency of the Army and the auxiliary resources for the public defense in the exigencies of war. This is the view, not of the professional soldier alone, but of both the soldier and the statesman.

Long service in the standing Army may increase discipline, improve the appearance of the Army on dress parade, and possibly add to its efficiency individually and collectively in some measure, and it would doubtless minimize the cares and responsibilities of commanding officers correspondingly. Whether it would develop the character and efficiency of the officers as would the three years' service without reenlistment may be seriously questioned. At any rate, it has no consideration for the public defense outside of the regular establishment, and it is known by all that in any serious conflict the Regular Army would be utterly inadequate for successful offense or defense. Dependence must be placed upon other resources in case of war, and the great question confronting the Government is whether it should rely chiefly upon untrained volunteers to fight its battles or provide as far as is practicable and with as little expense as possible for a thoroughly disciplined reserve force, supplemented by volunteers. This is an important question and one that deserves careful thought and study. But that question is not directly an issue in this discussion. The only question now for consideration is whether the term of service in the Army shall be five years or remain as it now is. Every consideration of public policy seems to favor the three-year term.

Other provisions of equal importance are carried in the bill, which I do not have time to discuss under the limitations of the debate, but I am not willing to support measures of so serious a character over the objection of the President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Staff of the Army unless I am morally certain that they are wrong and the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is right. I am deeply impressed with the belief that those who are in a position to know the needs of the Army and the wants of the country have advised more wisely and safely than the committee has.

Mr. PRINCE. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in line with the suggestion made by my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] I wish to say that aside from the vice which ordinarily attaches to this rule it is more pronounced by being invoked in this particular case than in any other instance I can cite in the history of this Congress.

There are three departments of the Government with reference to whose legislation I believe this rule should never be invoked, and those are the Departments of the State, War, and Navy. The veto power of the President of the United States should never be impaired in the least with reference to any legislation that affects the American Army, the American Navy, or our foreign affairs. In all these matters we should always present a united and undivided front.

What is the effect of this rule? If the President of the United States within 30 days finds before him a bill containing a vicious and destructive piece of legislation, either as an amendment coming from the committee or an original provision in the bill, his veto power is seriously handicapped, if not practically destroyed, for the reason that if he exercises it he strikes down the entire appropriation for the American Army for the fiscal year to which it pertains.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, the effect of the veto of this bill by the President of the United States will be practically to wipe out our military establishment for a period of 12 months. If gentlemen on the other side of the House regard this as a wise rule, as a "beneficent" rule, as was stated by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole a few days ago, they can see it in a light that I have never been able to view it in.

I believe that if there is any general provision changing present conditions in the Army, that provision should be introduced into the House, discussed before the committee in the form of a special bill, in reference to which every member of the committee can exercise the right to vote for it or against it on the floor, and in reference to which the President of the United States can exercise his unimpeded and unimpaired right to veto when it reaches him as the head of the Nation.

He should in this case be treated, not as the head of an adverse political party, not only as the President of the United States, but should be treated in this instance as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, and when he puts his pen to this legislation, or withholds his signature, he is acting in a double capacity, as Chief Executive of the Nation and as Commander in Chief of the Army. He should not be compelled to attach his signature to the bill containing an unwise provision, a vicious piece of legislation, in order that the United States Army for a period of 12 months may have food to sustain it and clothing to protect it against the elements.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the condition that the legislation now proposed would place the President in the event of the passage of this amendment. There is no man in public service who has a higher regard for the characteristics and services of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia who fathers this legislation than I. I do not believe that down deep in the heart of any man, however, there exists a strong feeling as to the necessity of the passage of this amendment, and I hope that when the time comes for a roll call in this House, which I presume will be demanded by some member of the committee, and if not by another, I will demand it myself, that in the wisdom of the House this particular feature of this bill will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I have no purpose at this time of using 15 minutes in this debate. I believe that one-half of that time will be sufficient. I am constrained, Mr. Chairman, to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the committee, for the reason that it is in the interest of economy. The choice is offered to this committee to indorse a saving of $2,000,000 by the United States Government or reject a proposition to save $2,000,000 or more than $2,000,000 of the people's money.

I have no doubt but that each of us have made protestations to the people that the expenses of this Government are enormous. It is common talk throughout the United States that the annual cost of maintaining a United States soldier on the soil of the United States, the average annual cost for each member of the Army, is $1,000, a much higher income than the average citizen earns. It is further said that the average cost of maintaining a member of the United States Army in the Philippine Islands is not $1,000, but $2,000 annually.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. What does the gentleman include in the estimate of $1,000 for a soldier?

Mr. TAGGART. I include the entire cost of the Army as a whole.

Mr. PRINCE. If it cost $100,000,000 for the military establishment and there were 100,000 soldiers, that would be $1,000. The gentleman divides the sum total by the number of men?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRINCE. He does not take into account the expense of the military establishment with reference to river and harbor improvement?

Mr. TAGGART. That is not included.

Mr. PRINCE. The officers in charge of river and harbor construction?

Mr. TAGGART. Their pay may be included, but there are only a few of them.

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman includes the upkeep of fortifications and barracks and quarters as part of the expense of that soldier?

Mr. TAGGART. It does include the upkeep of barracks and quarters as a part of the individual maintenance of the soldier.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman know how much it costs the Government for each soldier per day to feed him?

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I have read the estimates and the reports upon that matter, and I say it now costs about 23 cents a day.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman know of any family or anybody who is as well fed and taken care of for 23 cents a day as is the soldier who is taken care of by the United States Government?

Mr. TAGGART. I must submit that I do not know of any family that can live at the rate of 23 cents per day, and I am astonished to discover that the able-bodied men of the United States service can be maintained at that rate. It all goes to argue that somebody is gouged somewhere in the matter of the high cost of living in the United States.

Mr. PRINCE. If the gentleman will permit the suggestion, then Uncle Sam is not gouged in the care and keep of the soldiers, so far as their provisions are concerned.

Mr. TAGGART. It is plainly evident that he is not.

Mr. PRINCE. Then, would it not be well for the gentleman to tell all of the facts?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest, as to the 23 cents a day that it may cost Uncle Sam to feed the soldiers, that that is hardly a fair statement, because in almost every company in the United States Army there is a system of voluntary contributions from each individual soldier to what is known as the company fund, with which company fund some of the "luxuries" of life, as they are known in the Army, but the "necessities" of life, as known in everyday life, are purchased by the quartermaster sergeant or some officer of the company. I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois as a fact that he probably knows, and I ask him whether or not it is the fact that this practice exists?

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman who now has the floor has stated it, because he has read what the commissary says upon that question.

Mr. MURRAY. I have not stated it for that reason, but because I was in the Army in 1898, and I know. That is the reason I state it.

Mr. PRINCE. I am talking of the gentleman who has the right to speak upon the floor, and he has truthfully answered my question.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, just one moment—

The CHAIRMAN. All of this time comes out of the time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to pay the compliment to each of these gentlemen that they seem to come from Kansas. I was about to say, when this colloquy, extraneous to my observations and remarks, took place, and to which I was unhappily not a party, that the private soldier of the United States is the most thoroughly corporaled, sergeanted, lieutenant, captained, majored, colonel, and generaled man who has ever served under arms on the face of the earth. [Applause and laughter.]

For every two private soldiers in the Army there is one more man, and if there is anything doing, the private soldier is called upon to do it. The average cost of every man connected with the military organization of the United States, as I said, even when he stays at home, is at least $1,000 a year. It is not my purpose to advocate anything here that would militate against the efficiency of the United States Army. No Member present will outrival me in my estimate and admiration of the personnel of the Army, of its spirit, and of its efficiency; but I take this occasion to call attention to the fact that it is a tremendous burden upon the American people. Ninety-two millions of dollars were expended in the past year for military purposes, and when we suggest a diminution of that amount, gentlemen will rise in their places and admit the fact and call attention to the fact that the defense of this Union does not lie in the Regular Army, but in the patriotism of the people as manifested by their disposition to volunteer in time of war. I have no quarrel with gentlemen who hold to that opinion. I believe in the patriotism of the American people. I believe that every heart would be a shield and every hill a fortress in case we should be attacked by any foreign power. But, Mr. Chairman, if that streak of silver sea only 22 miles wide, that Shakespeare so beautifully mentioned, has protected England from invasion since the year 1066, what will you say of the 3,000 miles of ocean that stretch between us and Europe or the wide expanse of the Pacific that separates us from the yellow peoples of the ancient kingdoms of the East? Why should we expend the money of the people if a volunteer force is our main reliance in time of war?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a statement in that connection?

Mr. TAGGART. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Is the gentleman aware that since May 1, 1898, the military establishment has cost the Government of the United States $1,459,385,838.71?

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I have not read those precise figures, but I presume there can be neither doubt nor question that that vast expenditure has been made within the period of 14 years.

As I was about to say, I agree with those gentlemen who say that the defense of this country does not exactly depend upon its Regular Army, but does depend upon the fact that at the call of the President a million young men, if necessary, are ready and willing and anxious to volunteer their service for its defense. Let us never forget our volunteer soldiers, and our national defense is already accomplished.

Perhaps Regular Army experts will say that they would not be efficient until they were thoroughly drilled and disciplined. That, however true it may be, does not detract from the argument and the fact that the American citizen is ready to volunteer to protect this Government. His willingness makes the argument conclusive. His patriotism without arms, his patriotism in daily life, the traditions of his fathers, the history of his country, the splendid achievements of the volunteer armies in the field 50 years ago prove to the world that we are without danger of invasion from any source. Therefore I can not but give my consent to any amendment that may be attached to this bill, within reason, that will diminish the heavy burden borne by the American people on account of our Regular Army. Perhaps the President of the United States will be embarrassed. I hope not. I trust that no President of the United States will ever be embarrassed by saving $2,000,000 of the people's money, and gentlemen who argue that this bill will reach the President of the United States in its present form are at least ready to concede that there is another and more distinguished body than this that will give its consent to this amendment. It has been demonstrated and proven by some of the ablest men in the Army, in the hearings before this committee, that this economy can be practiced. It also follows as a mathematical proposition that if the efficiency of the soldier depends upon the length of his service the efficiency of the Army on a five-year enlistment plan will be as 5 is to 3 compared to what it is now. It is no use to argue that men were efficient on short notice in the volunteer service in the Civil War. War itself is the greatest disciplinarian of all. In time of war, when men volunteer, they are willing to submit to any kind of discipline for the purpose of fitting them for the service, but in time of peace, when the American citizen joins the Regular Army, he expects gentle treatment. He can not be manhandled and roughed into a soldier like the European conscript is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more in order to finish this sentence.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for one minute.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, if the American soldier was obliged to submit to the manhandling and the buffeting whereby the noncommissioned officer of the European armies, who acts like the big brother of the conscript, hammers a young man into a soldier in two years, we would not have any enlistments at all. We must resort to a gentler method whereby the military service grows upon the man and his sense of duty is refined into a subtle instinct whereby he becomes an efficient soldier, satisfied with his service, and able and willing to take care of himself under all conditions, and, above all things, to preserve and take care of his health under all circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is sustained. Manifestly there is not a quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STEPMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the House had under consideration the bill H. R. 18956, the Army appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called and reported a list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union finding itself without a quorum, the Chairman reports he caused the roll to be called, and that 277 gentlemen answered to their names—a quorum. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, to increase the term of enlistment from a three-year period to a five-year period, in my judgment, is retrogression and not progress. At the present time the General Staff of the Army is engaged in preparing a plan for the entire reorganization of the fighting force of the Army. We have been told that that plan will be submitted to Congress during the present session. We feel that the House can well afford to wait a few months before enacting this legislation, in order that we may receive the benefit of the experience of the officers of the Army who have devoted and are devoting much attention to this important question. True, the General Staff will probably advocate a reserve. In some quarters there is opposition to a reserve. It is stated that our country is so large that it will be impracticable to organize one, and yet experience has shown that no country can hope to be successful in a war with a first-rate power unless it has a large reserve to supplement the regular military force of the nation.

We have had experience in this country with a five-year enlistment period and also with a three-year enlistment period.

After 1868 the enlistment period was five years, and it continued to be five years until 1890. And what was the result during that time? I have here a table which shows how the enlisted men deserted in such numbers that the highest officers of the Army repeatedly asked Congress to reduce the term of enlistment from the five-year period to a three-year period. In 1885, 8.41 per cent of the enlisted force of the Army deserted, and our Army at that time was composed of an enlisted force of only 25,000 men. And yet practically 8½ per cent of that number deserted in that year. In the year 1886, 6.45 per cent deserted; in 1887, 6.84 per cent deserted; in 1888, 7.46 per cent deserted; in 1889, 8.13 per cent deserted; in 1890, the law was changed and, although but a few months elapsed between the date of the enactment and the close of the fiscal year, the desertions immediately dropped to 6.94 per cent. The act of 1890 made it optional whether the soldier should serve five years or whether he would take his discharge at the end of three years. Large numbers of soldiers immediately took advantage of the change in the law and the desertions fell at once from 8.13 per cent in 1889, to 6.94 per cent in 1890, and to 4.33 per cent in 1891. So that the desertions were reduced almost 50 per cent during the first year of the change in the law; and they continued to decrease under the three-year enlistment period, so that by 1892 there were only 3.95 per cent who deserted; in 1893, 4.83 per cent; in 1894, 3.14 per cent; in 1895, 3.42 per cent; in 1896, 4.01 per cent; in 1897, 3.12 per cent. So it continued until after the Spanish-American War.

During that war the Army was increased. There were 200,000 volunteers mustered into the service of the United States. Many of them were enlisted simply for the term of the war, and after the war was over the desertions increased, because large numbers of these volunteers felt that they had performed their duty to the country and that the war being over they were entitled to go home; and they did go home. The number of desertions, however, after 1903 began to decrease again. In 1908 the Congress raised the pay of the enlisted force, and especially of the noncommissioned officers, and since then the decrease in the number of desertions has been very marked, and last year only 3.12 per cent of the Army deserted.

Judging from past experience, I feel satisfied that if we go back to a five-year-enlistment period the number of desertions will again increase. The Adjutant General of the Army has well said, the military crime of desertion is one that should be severely punished.

Mr. AMES. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. AMES. Is it not a fact that many of the officers who appeared before the Military Committee advocating the five-year enlistment, or some of them, have never served with troops?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAY. And also some who were in favor of the three-year enlistment never served with troops?

Mr. KAHN. I do not recall any who favored a three-year enlistment who had never served with troops. But the officers who appeared before the Military Committee were largely staff officers who, if they had service with troops at all, had that service years and years ago. They have not been in touch with the troops in recent years and consequently do not know what the enlisted men of the Army want.

Now, the recruiting officers, Col. Murray, Maj. Dugan, and Maj. Kenley, who appeared before the committee, all thought it would be as easy to enlist a man for five years as it would be to enlist him for three years. Possibly that may be so. I do not know. But this is the result of experience—that under a five-year term of enlistment the soldier, if he find he is unfitted for the service, or if he find he has made a mistake, deserts, whereas under the three-year term of enlistment he is willing to stay until he gets an honorable discharge.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Are there not three things that have induced desertions? Is there not a more drastic punishment inflicted now than was ever inflicted before? And is not a large reward offered for the arrest of a deserter? And is it not a fact that that law has never been enforced so vigorously as now?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the law as to the apprehension and conviction of deserters has been in existence for years. But the fact remains that under the five-year term of enlistment the soldiers deserted to the extent of 8.41 per cent, while under the three-year term of enlistment a much smaller percentage deserted.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. KAHN. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, the majority of the committee say they sent out 400 letters to general officers of the Army to endeavor to find out what the sentiment is in regard to the five-year and three-year terms of enlistment. They received replies from 277 of these officers. What became of the other 123? I do not know. I never saw a reply from a single officer, and I do not think any other member of the minority saw a single reply which purported to have been received from any one of these general officers, who were referred to by the chairman of the committee in his remarks the other day as favoring the longer enlistment period. These general officers hold rank from major to colonel. They are not in touch with the enlisted men. The captain of the company, the lieutenants of the company, the noncommissioned officers of the company are the men who are in direct touch with the enlisted men. They know the sentiment of the enlisted men, and when the General Staff sent out letters to the various officers in the service schools of this country—and many of the officers attending these schools are in the lower grades and close to the enlisted men—87½ per cent of those officers declared in favor of a three-year term of enlistment as against the five-year term. There are 4,000 or more officers in the Army of the United States, and only 182 of them, according to the majority of the committee, declared in favor of the five-year term of enlistment. Thousands have not been heard from at all. In personal interviews that I have had with many of the officers they have nearly all declared in favor of a three-year term of enlistment.

My colleague on the committee, Mr. TILSON, went to San Antonio during the mobilization of our troops on the Mexican border. He interviewed all the officers of one brigade, 98 officers, and of those 98 officers, only 14 declared in favor of a five-year term of enlistment. All the other officers favored a three-year term of enlistment. That gives you an idea of the real sentiment in the Army upon this question.

Now, these three recruiting officers, Col. Murray and Maj. Dugan and Kenley, who, I believe, were practically the only officers who were not doing staff duty that appeared before the committee, testified that a five-year term—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I would like to have my time extended 10 minutes.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. KAHN. As against these three officers who favored the five-year term, take such officers as Gen. O. O. Howard, Gen. John M. Schofield, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Gen. R. C. Drum, Gen. J. C. Kelton, and Gen. George Crook, and to whom would you give the weight of authority?

Why, these officers whom I have named occupied a position in the American Army which endeared them to the hearts of their countrymen. They performed distinguished service upon many a battle field. They had gone through a great war. They had been in direct touch with the enlisted men of the United States Army, and every one of them recommended a reduction of the term of enlistment from five to three years. Let me again point out what they and several Secretaries of War recommended to Congress in the way of cutting down the enlistment period from five to three years.

Robert T. Lincoln, Secretary of War, in his report for 1884, says:

The Adjutant General * * * also suggests the propriety, as a means of decreasing the number of desertions, of a diminution of the term of service from five to three years, believing that there would thus be eliminated a great source of discontent on the part of men whose lack of aptitude for the service makes them dissatisfied and desperate in contemplating the length of the present contract of enlistment entered into by them.

Maj. Gen. J. M. Schofield, commanding the Division of the Missouri, in his report, dated October 9, 1885, says:

In my opinion it would be wise to reduce the term of first enlistment to three years and that of reenlistment to one year. The former would greatly reduce the number of desertions and the latter would tend to secure the continuous service of old soldiers.

Maj. Gen. O. O. Howard, commanding Department of the Pacific, in his report, dated September 17, 1886, says:

Under the present system of general recruiting the five years' term of enlistment, and with the present ration too small and ill cooked, it is doubtful if the average of desertions from the Army will ever be much reduced. * * * A reduction of the term of enlistment or a system granting discharges under proper restrictions would quickly lessen the number of desertions.

Maj. Gen. O. O. Howard, in his report for 1887, says:

I am still strongly of the opinion that a shorter first enlistment would be beneficial, making less desertions, and enabling recruiting officers to secure a larger proportion than now of good, reliable men.

Brig. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, in his report for 1887, says:

In this connection, I renew the recommendation made by me two years ago that the enlistment be for three years instead of five, and reenlistment of good soldiers in the same troop, company, regiment, or department for one year.

Redfield Proctor, Secretary of War, after an exhaustive discussion of the causes of desertion and the recommendations as to the remedies which lie with Congress, in his report for 1889, says:

Other points which are strongly recommended by many prominent officers and which have much to commend them, are:

(1) Authorize enlistments for three years only. If a man has not the elements of a soldier, or is himself dissatisfied with the service, it is better to release him within a reasonable time.

(2) For the same reason, give the soldier in time of peace the privilege of purchasing his discharge under well-defined regulations.

(3) Retain some part of the soldier's pay, which he forfeits by desertion, but which otherwise would augment his savings at the time of his discharge.

These suggestions are aimed at removing the causes of desertion, which is the true principle for any legislation; but with the best laws and the best administration, there is a certain class of men who will desert unless restrained by a system of punishment effectively administered.

Brig. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, in his report for 1889, says:

I would renew my recommendations made four years ago, namely, that enlistment be for three years instead of five, and that worthy men be authorized to reenlist in the departments in which they are serving for one year.

And as against the recommendations of these distinguished chiefs of the War Department and officers of high rank in the Army of our country, the majority of the committee has set up the opinion of Col. Murray, Maj. Dugan, and Maj. Kenly, of the recruiting service.

Mr. Chairman, the other day the committee reduced the Cavalry force of this country by five regiments. At that time considerable reference was made to a report of a well-known Army officer, and one short paragraph of his report was read.

I read from the Reports of Military Observers Attached to the Armies in Manchuria During the Russo-Japanese War. I think my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLISON] read this paragraph of that report:

Gen. Kuropatkin, I have heard, came to regret that he had brought out so much cavalry, burdening the railroad with its transportation and adding to the difficulties of supply. If, for example, he had been content with half as much cavalry, say, 12,000, he could have had 30,000 or 40,000 more infantry.

But my friend from Texas forgot to read this portion of the report:

Of course, when belligerent nations possess a common land frontier it is most important for either to have a preponderance of cavalry to cover the mobilization of its armies. In the case of our own country such importance would attach to cavalry in wars with Mexico or Great Britain.

And what is the condition that confronts us to-day? We may have to send our troops to the Mexican border again, and if we do 15 régiments of Cavalry will be none too many.

But while these gentlemen on the other side were lauding this officer for his brief reference to the Russian cavalry force in Manchuria they forgot to read what he said with regard to the necessity for reserves. Oh, yes; they conveniently forgot to mention that. The General Staff is now working upon that very question of a reserve force. This officer who made this report is an exceptionally able officer. He is the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia. He was Capt. William V. Judson when he was with the Russian army observing the maneuvers in Manchuria during the Russo-Japanese war, and he is now Maj. Judson, of the Engineer Corps. This is what he said about reserves at the time he made this report:

Another lesson concerns the reserves of trained men that must be poured into organizations at the front if in war early disasters are to be repaired or initial successes followed up. Alone of the great nations, if recent reports from China be correct, the United States possesses no reserves of this character, although many minor nations have provided for them.

If we should ever have to land troops in Argentina or Chile, we should, I doubt not, be very much surprised and chagrined to witness the advantages secured by those little nations through their adopted systems of military training. Of course, the reserves are secured ordinarily by means of conscriptional laws, and if Great Britain resorts to some form of conscription we shall be almost alone in the lack of it. Now, one would be foolish to advocate conscription in the United States during peace, although both North and South resorted to it during the Civil War. But when we see every army in the world that is worth the name existing not merely to perform the semipolice duties of peace, to be filled up in war with untrained volunteers and bounty men, but, as its principal function, training great numbers of reservists for which in war it will merely form the nucleus, it seems worth while to consider whether without conscription and by methods which must be popular with the people we can not accomplish the same result. To suggest a plan, a certain proportion, say, 30,000 of our Regular Army might be enlisted, each man for a period of, say, 15 years, the first 3 years to be served with the colors, as now, and the last 12 years on the reserve list, where he would receive a certain sum, say, $40 per year, so long as periodical medical examinations should show his continued fitness and in return for a continuous readiness to return to the colors in time of war. Thus more than 100,000 reservists might be developed and maintained for an annual expenditure that, as a maximum, 15 years hence would not materially exceed $5,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, one final observation in regard to this matter of increasing the term of enlistment. It may save some money. I do not know whether it will or not. My personal belief is that it will not save a dollar, for I think the figures that have been submitted by the committee are not entirely reliable. I think it can be demonstrated that they are not entirely reliable; but I feel confident that the retired list of enlisted men will increase materially as the result of this legislation. At the present time, in this very bill, there is appropriated for retired pay of enlisted men 14 per cent of the entire amount that is appropriated for the pay of all of the enlisted men of the Army, so that the men on the retired list are receiving proportionately three times the amount of pay that the men who are out in the field are receiving. Furthermore, if this extension of the term of enlistment be made, the money saved, if there be any money saved, will come out of the pockets of the enlisted men. You will reduce their pay. We found it necessary to increase their pay in 1908 in order to maintain the military establishment as it should be maintained. The result of the increased pay was immediately beneficial. And now, when we have attained a great measure of success in that respect, you gentlemen on the other side propose to reduce the pay of the enlisted men.

It would have a baneful influence on the Army. The enlisted personnel will again become discouraged. I have received numerous letters from enlisted men urging me not to favor this proposition. They are afraid to have their names known, otherwise I should be pleased to insert some of the letters in the RECORD. But when you come right down to the men that will be affected by this legislation, if the chairman of the committee had taken the trouble to consult their wishes instead of the wishes of some of the general officers, he would have found that the enlisted men, including noncommissioned officers of the Army, by an overwhelming majority would have protested against the pending legislation. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY].

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Chairman, since the dominant party on this side of the House took control of legislative affairs here and assumed the responsibility of government, every move that has been made has been confronted by the cry that reform of evils should be accomplished by the friends of the administration. When our party undertook the reform of the tariff the cry went up from the party on the other side that there was an imperative necessity for the reform of our revenue laws, but that those laws should be reformed and the evils flowing from them should be remedied by the friends of the tariff.

When reform in conditions in the military establishment was inaugurated by the dominant party in this House the department immediately became interested in a plan of reorganization; but this activity never became apparent, this zeal for reorganization never became manifest until the party on this side of the House demonstrated its determination to cure the evils that exist and cut down and eliminate some of the extravagances that were practiced in the maintenance of the Army and in the management of our military affairs. [Applause.]

We have been confronted by the argument in this discussion that we should have a reserve in this country; that this reserve force would meet all the necessities of the military situation. A reserve, it is true, has been established in continental Europe and in other foreign lands, but conditions there are different from conditions that exist here. Our country is greater territorially and from the standpoint of population. The spirit of the people is different; personal liberty prevails here to a greater extent than there; and the personal quality, the personal equation controls more completely here, and is the dominant factor in our scheme of military activity. The principles of the reserve can not be applied here as in continental Europe for the reason that the application and enforcement of the law of reserve presupposes a system of espionage, a system of surveillance, to which the people of this country will not calmly submit. [Applause.]

Under our institutions, under our spirit of freedom, under the spirit of individual freedom as contemplated by our system of government, the mailed fist of militarism will not be permitted to stand by the cradle and take the young man as he reaches maturity and force him by coercion and conscription into the Army. [Applause.]

Such a system will never prevail in this country. I notice in the hearings that the Quartermaster General and the Paymaster General testified before the committee that the legislation with regard to the term of enlistment as proposed by this section which refers to the extension of the term of enlistment would effect a reduction of $2,220,766 annually in the expenditure for the item of clothing, transportation, continuous-service pay, bonus of reenlistment, and travel pay on discharge.

The party on this side of the aisle has devoted itself to the policy of economy, a policy that will reduce and retrench the expenditures of the military establishment. This bill as formulated by the committee contemplates a reduction of from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, as I have been reliably informed, and this feature of the extension of the term of enlistment from three to five years will reduce the expenditure annually to an amount of more than $2,000,000.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, this enlistment if enacted into law will count not only for greater economy in the service, but for greater efficiency in the fighting force of the Army. It will give to the Government the benefit of two years of training of which under the three-year system it is now deprived—two years of the most valuable service that the enlisted man can give to the Government.

It will build up a fighting machine which can be relied upon to do effective work upon the line of battle. I have listened attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from California wherein he spoke against the extension of this term from three to five years. In looking over the hearings which were held by the committee I find on page 129 that the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] had the following to say by way of interpolation in the proceedings:

Having looked up some of the reasons which actuated the Congress to reduce the period from five years to three years, I found that there was a bill that repealed at the same time the law—in fact, I think it was the same bill that reduced the term of service—that allowed a soldier to continue 10 years in the Army at the time the five-year period, with the privilege of leaving at the end of three years, was in vogue, and there was general complaint all over the country, and the testimony of the Army officers who reported to the War Department shows that the men were dissatisfied, that many looked upon continuing with the Army as a career, and that it was advisable to have in the Regular Army seasoned veterans, men who had all kinds of experience and who could act as a sort of leaven to the loaf when you got in a lot of new recruits without a particle of experience. Your plan would be directly contrary to the experience of those men at that time?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. Of course the gentleman does not understand that that refers to the reduction of the term of enlistment; it refers to the change in the law which prohibited any reenlistment after 10 years.

Mr. CONRY. That is right. I referred to it for that particular reason, because it demonstrates that the extension of the term of enlistment gives the enlisted man the training, the discipline, the power, and the morale to leaven the raw recruits as they enter into the military service of the Republic. A three-year enlistment service will not prove effective as a leavening force, and it is my positive conviction that a five-year service will. It is a fact universally recognized by officers experienced in the line and medical officers who have studied the question from the standpoint of long-term enlistments that the young, immature soldier has less endurance, less stamina, and succumbs more readily to disability and disease in times of peace as in times of war than the old, trained, experienced, and acclimated veteran.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman admit that the term of enlistment was reduced from five years to a flat three years in the same law that repealed the law which did not permit reenlistment after 10 years?

Mr. CONRY. I will admit that; but the passage of that law, the gentleman said here in general debate, was largely because of the frequency in the occurrence of the crime of desertion. The gentleman stated that desertions take place in the first year in a larger percentage in the Army than in any subsequent year, and if we multiply enlistment periods it will increase this percentage of loss by desertion. The only way to logically meet that situation and to prevent an increase in the crime of desertion is by precluding the possibility of a frequent recurrence of enlistment periods, and that can be done most effectively by extending the term of enlistment.

"The uniform record of the unseasoned soldier," says Lord Raglan in Crimea, "is one of inefficiency and disease." Napoleon, in a similar spirit, proclaimed after Leipzig, "Give me old men; recruits unseasoned and immature serve only to fill the hospitals and encumber the roadsides." In the Peninsular War 300 men, seasoned, disciplined, and trained by 5 years' service, were accounted more efficient than 1,000 recent recruits.

The ancient Persian monarchy, strong and powerful, not only in size but also in the amount of men and treasure it could command and control, tottered and fell before the Macedonian phalanx, a fighting machine composed only of seasoned, well-trained, and perfectly disciplined fighters.

Thirty-five thousand veteran Greeks followed Alexander to the conquest of the world.

The old guard, scarred in the conflicts of many hard-fought battles, sent the great Napoleon careering through Europe, reveling in the conquest of thrones and the creation of new dynasties.

Everywhere, in every great battle that has influenced the destiny of mankind and changed the current of political history, wherever military prowess has testified to the courage, the patriotism, and the valor of mankind, whether it be at Fontenoy, Corunna, Waterloo, or Gettysburg, the old, the experienced, the seasoned, and thoroughly acclimated soldier has by his efficiency as a fighter and his endurance under fire forcibly exemplified the wisdom and policy of long-term enlistments. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The amendment proposed by Mr. HAY, providing for the abolition of five regiments of Cavalry, is a distinctive advance in the direction of economy. We have in the Army to-day approximately 15,000 Cavalry and 30,000 Infantry, a Cavalry force out of all proportion to the Infantry establishment. The Cavalry Arm of the military establishment is becoming more and more each year subordinated to the Infantry as an efficient fighting force. The improved magazine rifle used so destructively in modern warfare, the decimating fire of the improved artillery, the modern engines of destruction so merciless to an enemy when under the skillful control of an efficient artillery corps, renders it impossible for cavalry to successfully assail, in a frontal attack, either artillery or infantry, in any formation in which the artillery and infantry are able to use their arms and observe the approach of cavalry over long distances. Mars la Tour and Balaklava are sanguinary instances of the folly and the crime of launching cavalry in a frontal attack upon entrenched infantry and artillery. And the world will never see, humanity will never tolerate, and no wise commander will ever again enact the merciless slaughter of these historic but fatal cavalry charges.

Modern warfare has been distinguished by the unimportant part played by cavalry in active hostilities. Kuropatkin in the Russo-Japanese War had under his command a cavalry force of 25,000 men and the Japanese but 5,000, and when the Russian general was asked why he did not utilize his cavalry more effectively as an aggressive force against the enemy he replied, "Because we had no cavalry force opposing us."

In the Cuban campaign the Cavalry did not accompany the army of invasion in any large force, and after the conquest it became a sort of police power for the preservation of order in the island. Identically the same condition prevailed in the campaign in the Philippines.

But it has been asserted in this debate that the Cavalry is necessary to the perfection of mobility in the Army. To a certain extent this is still true, but not to as large an extent as in the past. Our country to-day is covered completely with a network of railways and telegraphs. Our facilities for transportation and our wonderful means of intercommunication have developed in a manner that has everywhere revolutionized conditions in modern warfare. The scientific discoveries, the inventive genius of the age have exerted an influence in a thousand ways upon the circumstances under which armies exist and operate in the field.

The bicycle, the motor car, the aeroplane, the hydroplane, the manifold uses of a military character to which electricity can be efficaciously applied in modern warfare all tend to render the Cavalry force less and the Infantry force more necessary and efficient as fighting machines in modern warfare. And the amendment proposed by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. HAY] is not only justified by a wise policy of economy but also by the changing conditions in the warfare of the future, which, through the advance in science, will largely affect and influence the combinations that lead up to future battles.

In the legislative features of the measure before the House that portion which contemplates the consolidation of the supply departments of the Army recommends itself potentially to every

Army officer who is interested in the perfection and maintenance of an effective and economical military establishment. In ancient times armies were compelled to depend for subsistence entirely upon the food and supplies which they found in the country through which their warlike operations were conducted; and when the resources of that country were exhausted and they were opposed by a hostile force strongly entrenched, they were compelled to fall back, simply because the supplies, which are the lifeblood of the Army, could not be obtained and continuously furnished along regularly established lines of communication. Under the cumbersome and unwieldy system which now obtains in the independent departments of the supply corps it has been said that it requires all the complicated and sluggish machinery of three of those departments to move an ambulance around a corner. Such a condition in time of peace is unjustifiable, but in time of war it is criminally reprehensible. It is the direct purpose of the consolidation feature of this bill to secure greater efficiency and economy in the administration of the military arm of the Government.

An army in the field must not only be able to replenish its supplies from time to time, but it must have an unbroken continuity of supplies to render it efficient as a fighting machine along the line of operations. An army is a fighting force which depends not only for its vitality upon the training, the discipline, the enthusiasm, and the devotion which hold it together, but also on its line of communications upon the maintenance of which its very existence depends. The supply department of the Army is, therefore, of the most vital importance to its efficiency and vitality. Upon the perfection of the organization of this department depend entirely the organic unity and efficiency of the fighting forces. A body of men who are starving can not be held submissive to the restraint of discipline any more effectively than can a body that has been dispersed. The line of communication must not only be protected from attack, but the machinery in control of the supply department by means of which subsistence is forwarded to the front from the base of supplies must be perfect in its operation. This bill stands for efficiency and is directly in the interest of economy. It is based upon principles of statesmanship and constructive reorganization. Never before has such genuine reform in the reorganization of the Army been attempted, and never before have the real interests of the country and the Army been consulted in such a genuinely patriotic spirit.

This measure meets a demand for Army reorganization that has been urged for years. It is a forward movement along the lines of retrenchment and reform toward the complete fulfillment of Democratic pledges. The magnificent manner in which this legislation has been conducted through the House illustrates the desire and exemplifies the capacity of the Democratic organization in this House to deal wisely, conservatively, and effectively with the affairs of Government. [Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES].

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, I venture to speak for the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, and state that there is not one of us who does not stand for economy in the Republican administration of the War Department as firmly as any Member on the majority side; but the trouble with this legislation and the viciousness of it lies in the fact that your boasted economy, your cry to the country for votes, is predicated upon the proposition that you would make your economies at the expense of the enlisted man and the noncommissioned officer. Not only that, but you economize at the expense of the efficiency of the Army, and I can demonstrate these two propositions to you if you will listen and reason.

In time of peace the Army in its present size has no justification for its maintenance as a fighting machine unless it is considered as the only means of preparing for emergency in time of war. No one maintains that the Regular Army exists for police duty. A Pennsylvania constabulary or a force corresponding to the Canadian mounted police would better suffice for police duty. Then, what is your Army for? It is the fountain head and source of military knowledge and instruction. You detail officers to the militia to instruct the militia, and so its enlisted strength, noncommissioned, and its personnel should be used for what? As a school of instruction, so that when war does come we will have a body of military men in the citizenship of the country who can respond to a call of arms. What could we do with only the few thousands of the Regular Army in time of war? We would be unable to lift a hand in defense without dependence on the militia as a reserve.

If you will accept the proposition that the function of the Army should be that of a school, the following results logically: Take your school and use it to its best advantage as a school.

Either you can take one enlisted man, who costs $1,000 a year, as is the case in the Army to-day, and instruct him at a thousand dollars a year for 30 years, and have at the end of that time a trained, professional soldier on the retired list and drawing the highest rate of pay, or you can take the same amount of money and instruct 10 men for 3 years each, and at the end of that time you will have in active service 1 man serving the colors and 9 others instructed in military science, who have gone out into civil life, ready to fight for the country, and who constitute a reserve in the proper sense of the term in time of need. Perhaps 1 or 2 of this 9 may die in the course of the 30 years. These are two extremes. Either you can instruct 1 professional man for 30 years for $30,000 or you can instruct 10 men for 3 years for $1,000 a year. Economy! You believe in economy at the expense of the enlisted man and the noncommissioned officers. All military history and military experience go to show that the best service is rendered to a country by an army where the enlistment is kept down to 2 and 3 years, and for this reason, that it has been demonstrated beyond peradventure that 2 years is enough time in which to instruct any man in being a soldier, and less than 2 if you do not make him mow the lawn and carry gravel, and do police duty, as is done in this country. If you can instruct a man to be a soldier in 2 years, what on earth is the use of instructing him for 5 years, over and over again? If your Army is a school of instruction, and that is all that it can possibly be in its present size, you are simply crippling its efficiency by this proposed term of enlistment, because it can only turn out so many scholars every year, and if you limit the curriculum to 5 years instead of 3, you are diminishing the number of students it can turn out.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONYER] talked about a reserve. The spirit of this country is well known by everyone here. The reserve spoken of and considered by the War Department is simply a number of educated men, men who have been in the military service, men whose names are on the roll of honor of honorable discharge, men to whom we can turn in time of necessity; men drawing no pay, subject to no service; men who know how to do and what to do under proper leadership.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the Member from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, our attention has been directed by the chairman of the committee to the large number of officers who have rendered an opinion on the subject of five-year enlistment versus three-year enlistment. Why, a large majority on that list of officers are old officers, men who have been in the service a great many years, men who were in the service before the three-year period went into effect 13 years ago. But reason about it; think about it. Who are the specially educated and chosen officers in our Army, who are those who study military science, who are those who study the art of war? Why, naturally, those in the General Staff, those in the Army War College, those in the School of the Line, those in the Mounted Service School, those in the Coast Artillery School, those in the Military Academy. These are the officers we should turn to for military information, and men on the majority side deserve to be criticized for bringing in a bill without going to the War Department and getting information therefrom on such a technical matter, and that is why we on this side stand up and oppose such ill-considered legislation. No man, no committee, is so great or so large, no man knows so much that he can sit down in a committee and draft legislation affecting the Army or the Navy without getting his figures from the fountain source in regard to what is best and what is to be desired. Now, let me call your attention to this fact: In the General Staff 33 officers favor the three-year term of enlistment and only 1 favors the five-year term; in the Army War College 31 favor the three-year enlistment and only 2 favor the five; in the School of the Line 77 officers favor the three-year period and only 13 favor the five-year period; in the Mounted Service School 19 favor the three-year term and only 3 favor the five; in the Coast Artillery School 47 officers favor the three-year period and only 4 favor the five; in the Military Academy 71 officers favor the three-year period and 16 favor the five. So that all the burden of proof is against the five-year service. If you really want economy, if you would only practice what you preach, go to the three-year term of enlistment for the enlisted man, permitting noncommissioned officers to reenlist so they may instruct, and prevent reenlistment of the private, and we can show you and the War Department will show you that in 15 years you will have saved $25,000,000. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes' time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this section. I am very strongly opposed to it on its merits. It tends to incapacitate our little Army for the only purpose for which it exists—to promote the national defense when war comes. The effect would be to produce professional soldiers and make it impossible for the Regular Army to merge readily into the great body of our citizen soldiery upon which the national defense depends. The day of the professional soldier has passed. Every nation in the world has abandoned the long-term service for the short term to keep the army close to the people. If this holds abroad, how much more does it hold in our country? To make the term of enlistment long is to go back a generation. But it is not to the merits of this section that I wish to address myself in the short time at my disposal.

Even if the proposition were meritorious I maintain that its merits can not be determined here and we should not take the position of disposing of fundamental questions of national defense as incidental matters upon appropriation bills. The Navy and the Army in their efficiency are fundamental matters of national defense. The deepest instinct of this Nation, whether politicians recognize it or not, is the instinct of self-preservation. If we deliberately and in proper course come to the conclusion that certain terms of enlistment are advisable, then I believe the people will accept our judgment; but the people do not propose to have broad questions of national defense trifled with. Such disruptive legislative propositions should not be placed upon an appropriation bill in the interests of a questionable economy. As a matter of fact, the effect of this section would entail an ultimate increase of expense.

Inefficiency in the Army or Navy is the most extravagant thing in the world. To place such far-reaching, disruptive legislation upon an appropriation bill is unprecedented. I do not believe there is a parallel in the history of this Government.

But even if our course had had the proper deliberation, this whole question as it is now before us comes down laden with irregularities. If we were here under conditions permitting time for deliberation, I would charge conspiracy. I charge that many recommendations and documents and much of the information that has been supplied to the Committee on Military Affairs have been misleading, and that they emanated from The Adjutant General of the Army, who expected in return for his services to be made a lieutenant general.

If I should define the conspiracy, it would be conspiracy on the part of The Adjutant General to become a lieutenant general by the use of irregular means and of the chairman of the committee to make economies and accomplish things by the co-operation of The Adjutant General, though not with any agreement of reward.

I do not question the chairman of this committee. I want to say here that I believe he is as honest as the day is long. [Applause.] I want to pay a tribute to his earnestness of purpose and his desire to economize and to do real things while he is in charge of that committee.

But I claim that these very noble impulses on the part of the chairman have been taken advantage of by an ambitious officer sitting at a desk who has remained at a desk continually for 26 years in Washington, and has risen from a captain in the Surgeon General's office in charge of pension records to the position of Adjutant General with rank of major general. He has risen one step after another by ingratiating himself in the confidence of Members of Congress and utilizing riders upon other measures. In one measure by a rider he abolished the office of Adjutant General. In another, when he was ready, he had the same office restored. He now utilizes the same method with the purpose of becoming a lieutenant general.

I charge that the substance of the recommendations embraced in the legislative features proposed in this bill comes from The Adjutant General, and that he has made none of these recommendations through regular channels, neither in his annual reports nor in communications to the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the Chair tell me how much time we have remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Eight minutes.

Mr. PRINCE. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson].

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman undertake to state to this House that an Army officer has had sufficient influence in the House to make and unmake legislation?

Mr. HOBSON. I do. I make that charge, and if you would consider this legislation on this report, if you would bring in a bill here and give us a chance to deliberate on it, I would prove it. I ask my colleagues that they do not put this legislation upon an appropriation, but allow the House full time for its consideration.

This is the same legislation that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs laid before a Democratic caucus and our caucus declined to take it up. Much more should we not take it up now as a rider on an appropriation bill. I further charge that a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs is opposed to this legislation, and that the caucus of the majority members, eliminating various propositions by compromising, was all that bound the Democratic members as a body to stand for the five-year enlistment.

I claim that the whole thing is irregular, and our great party, in control of this House now for the first time in many years, should not trifle with these vital questions of national defense. Since they threw out the battleships I have had clippings that I have seen gathered, and I find but one paper in the United States—and that a Republican paper—has indorsed the action.

The deepest thing in a nation is the instinct of self-preservation. Matters pertaining to defense are at least entitled to serious consideration.

Mr. TAGGART. Can you cite any instance where that instinct of self-preservation has not manifested itself in a Volunteer Army in this country?

Mr. HOBSON. It always has. The instinct is as deep in America as in any nation in the world. Politicians need not think that they can trifle with it. The efficiency of the Army and the Navy are worthy of the best consideration on the part of this House, and especially from our side of the House. And I ask whether you believe in the merits of the proposition or not? It is the most unmeritorious thing I have ever seen. Let us not put this increase upon this appropriation bill against the judgment of the President, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, the Army War College, the Army School of the Line, the Mounted Service School, the Coast Artillery School, the Military Academy, and the bulk of the officers and all the enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman charge that information has been furnished to this committee from a source—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I would make many more charges if this were deliberately considered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to know if the gentleman from Alabama had this information which he is disclosing to the House—

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman will arrange so that we can consider this measure deliberately, I will prove my statements, and more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. How many minutes have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman. He has made certain charges.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Prince] yield further time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson]?

Mr. PRINCE. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes if the other side will contribute two minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Either yield or do not yield.

Mr. HOBSON. Let the gentleman put his question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield time?

Mr. PRINCE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for two minutes further.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to know if the gentleman had this information upon which he bases his charge, that this House has been furnished with information which was to be in return for something, a reward—if he had it before to-day, why he waited until the closing hour or minute of the debate to furnish this information to the House? There was no limit placed upon the general debate on this bill.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not charge that there was any understanding between The Adjutant General and the chairman that the former was to get a reward. My charge of conspiracy is that The Adjutant General conspired to get the position of lieutenant general irrespective of his methods, and that the chairman conspired to realize economy and to do something.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not answer my question, because even if the gentleman from Virginia had received improper information, or had received accurate information in an improper way—and that is the basis of the gentleman's charges—it does not justify him in withholding from the House the information which he claims to have when he had the opportunity to furnish it. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman that I would have him understand by my statements that information that is misleading, and proven to be misleading, has been furnished from some source, and that I charge that source is The Adjutant General's Office, and that recommendations from the same office came in an irregular way—that this whole matter of legislation on this bill is freighted with irregularity. [Applause.]

Now, I do not propose to make any charge against the chairman of the committee. In fact, I wish to pay him my tribute, and say that his patriotic impulses have been taken advantage of.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest this to the gentleman from Alabama: It is immaterial where the information came from. The important question—whether the legislation is proper or not—is this: If the gentleman knew that anybody had been misled and knew it before to-day and knew it before the expiring moments of this debate, the duty devolved upon him to communicate that information to the House, and not leave it to this late moment and communicate it in this mysterious way. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I can recognize perfectly well an adroit move to try to push this measure through, but I will repeat my charge and I will make it good. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill has been before the House for almost two weeks. There has been no attempt to railroad it through. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. If there is no further debate, the Chair will put the question before the House.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] exhausted his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has two minutes remaining.

Mr. PRINCE. If there is any other speaker I will yield to him. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to ask if the chairman of the committee has more than one speaker on his side left? Has the gentleman more than one speaker?

Mr. HAY. I have not.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, we have gone over this section very fully and have debated it, most of us, very calmly, and I shall not vary from my accustomed mode or manner of debating this question. I do not think that a five-year term of enlistment is for the good of the general service. It has been shown by the discussion this afternoon that the three-year enlistment is the term of enlistment which has caused to be enlisted in the Army a permanent enlisted force.

As to that charge, I do not know anything about it. I do know that the bill came to the committee, was considered by the committee, was amended by the committee, and is here before the House in Committee of the Whole as the bill coming from the Committee on Military Affairs. The minority object to it and have presented their views within the compass of only three or four pages, that can be readily read by every member of the Committee of the Whole.

We charge that the five-year enlistment will add to the burden of the expenses of the Government $25,000,000 in 15 years as against the three-year enlistment. We charge that it will make the Army a permanent personnel of enlisted men, that it will take from the body of the people men who ought to go back to the body of the people. We charge that it is better to have 10 men enlist in a period of 30 years, 9 to go back to the body of the people, to join the National Guard, or to join the various fraternal and civic societies that have a quasi-military organization, to train those men, and when needed by the Government to rally to the colors in time of war. We charge that they will be a reserve of patriotic men, without paying a single solitary cent to them after they leave the service, but will remain a portion of the reserve, to defend the flag in time of need. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY rose and was recognized, there being prolonged applause on the Democratic side.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] has seen fit to attack the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say here and now that every attack he has made is without foundation in fact.

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. HAY. I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman. I did not interrupt him. The charge that a conspiracy was entered into by the Committee on Military Affairs, by its chairman, or by any one member of it, is untrue from start to finish. [Applause.] Why, the gentleman says that I am honest. I would like to know how any conspirator can be honest. [Applause.] And if a conspiracy had been entered into, both parties to that conspiracy must necessarily have been dishonest. I charge that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] says what is not true when he says that I, or the Committee on Military Affairs, received any information from the War Department in an irregular manner or from The Adjutant General in an irregular manner. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I decline to yield to the gentleman. I state that every particle of information which I received from The Adjutant General of the Army was asked for by me through the Secretary of War and sent to me by the Secretary of War. [Applause.] The charge that a majority of the Democrats on the Committee on Military Affairs are opposed to the five-year enlistment is an insult to the Democratic members of that committee. [Applause.] Is it to be presumed that the majority of that committee would by a unanimous vote direct me to make a report embodying a provision to which they were opposed? I say it is not.

Why, gentlemen of the committee, where does the gentleman from Alabama get his information as to how this information was sent to the committee? I have no doubt he got it from the Chief of Staff of the Army, Gen. Wood. He could not have gotten it from any other source, or from the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield there? It is not myself, but Gen. Wood, who is involved.

Mr. HAY. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman. What is it?

Mr. HOBSON. Just simply to say that the gentleman is mistaken in alleging Gen. Wood as the source of my primary information.

Mr. HAY. Your primary information?

Mr. HOBSON. I have had conferences with Gen. Wood, but the inference made that he volunteered information to me is not correct.

Mr. HAY. Gentlemen, I want to say that this bill, every line of it, was prepared by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I want to give to Gen. Ainsworth, The Adjutant General of the Army, the credit for having advised me when I went to him and asked him for advice. The Army has no better officer than Gen. Ainsworth. [Applause.] I understand he has been relieved from duty to-day by an order of the President.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman state the reason why he has been removed?

Mr. HAY. Indeed, I do not know why.

Mr. PRINCE. Will you permit me to state?

Mr. HAY. I have only my information from the newspapers.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman permit me to state briefly what the reason was?

Mr. HAY. I have not the time.

Mr. PRINCE. Give me half a minute, so that the Committee of the Whole may know.

Mr. HAY. I have not interrupted a single gentleman—

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman from Virginia has stated that Gen. Ainsworth has been removed.

Mr. HAY. It is a fact, is it not?

Mr. PRINCE. It is; and I will give the gentleman the reason why, if he will permit me. If he does not want the information, I can not give it.

Mr. HAY. I have information enough from that side of the House now. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I only know that is a fact, and I want to say that if it is in connection with this bill or its preparation it is a great injustice to one of the most accomplished officers and one of the best men in the Government service. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield for half a minute?

Mr. HAY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman made reference to the fact that he might be removed on account of this bill.

Mr. HAY. I did not. I said nothing of the sort. I said if he had been relieved on account of this bill.

Mr. PRINCE. I can tell the gentleman the reason, if he wants to know, and I think the country ought to know it.

Mr. HAY. Now, gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson], whose patriotism seems to consist in arousing the fears of the people of this country against the people of other countries, which seems to consist in expressing his opinions on the Chautauqua platform and being absent from this House, says that we are inclined to railroad this legislation through the House. Why, gentlemen, this bill has been under consideration for very nearly two weeks, and a part of that time the gentleman, I presume, has been away, as he usually is, and has not known what was going on. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This clause in the bill was introduced into this House last April. Hearings were had upon this particular part of the bill last summer, and everybody had an opportunity to come before the committee and express his views upon it. A great many officers did come before the committee and did give their views on the matter. I did not hear any request from the gentleman from Alabama to come before the committee; I have not heard that he had any interest in this bill until a few moments ago when I heard that he was going to make a speech against it, as he always seems ready to make a speech against any proposition which looks toward saving the money of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, there is no question of railroading this bill through the House. Nobody wants to railroad it through the House, nor has any attempt of that sort been made. Owing to the peculiar attack made upon me by the gentleman from Alabama, I have not done as I intended to—give the reasons why this 5-year enlistment is better for the Army than the 3-year enlistment; but I want to say to you that it does not impair the efficiency of the Army. I am sustained in that by The Adjutant General of the Army, by the Inspector General of the Army, by 3 of the most experienced recruiting officers in the Army, and by 191 line officers of the Army. I want to say that I am antagonized in it by the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War and by a lot of young officers who are the recipients of the favors of the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, who otherwise would not be heard in this matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOBSON. In the interest of the officers who are impugned, may I ask the gentleman—

Mr. HAY. I impugn nobody's character, I have not said a word against their character.

Mr. HOBSON. But will the gentleman—

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Virginia declines to yield and I ask that the rule be enforced.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to follow the example of the gentleman from Alabama and impugn anybody's character, nor have I done so. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have simply stated that these young men, 125 captains, 91 lieutenants, who testified in favor of the three-year enlistment are young officers on detached duty, and sent to that detached duty by the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, and it is most natural that they should think as the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War do on a question of this character. Now I will yield, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HAY. Just one moment. I want to state that the Democratic members of the Military Committee desired to get up individually and deny this charge made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PRINCE. Under the circumstances, as the gentleman consumed a part of his time in a way that he did not intend to, I have no objection, and I will ask unanimous consent that my colleague on the committee have the time.

Mr. HAY. I will make the statement for them. I wanted to give them time, as they requested that they might get up one by one and repudiate the charges made by the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia first reported, and then the amendment to the amendment, so that all Members may be informed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to be reported?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that both amendments be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia and then report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PRINCE) there were—ayes 69, noes 105.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and, pending the announcement of the Chair, Mr. PRINCE demanded a division.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PRINCE, to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws authorizing increase of the pay of commissioned officers and enlisted men of the Army serving beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union, and the Territories of the United States contiguous thereto, are hereby repealed to the extent to which such increase of pay is authorized by such laws.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, in view of what has transpired recently, that there is not a member of that committee who does not hold in affectionate regard, in unquestioned esteem, and unqualified confidence the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], the chairman of that committee. [Applause.] Incidents of the character occurring this afternoon, of course, are always more or less deplorable, but inasmuch as there has been injected into this discussion the matter of the attitude of a certain Army officer with reference to this particular bill or the measures that at one time were thought would be incorporated in the bill, and as the question as to his being relieved from active duty in the Army has been raised within the last few minutes, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk a copy of the original document constituting the reasons upon which Gen. Ainsworth has within the last few hours been relieved from duty. The document consists of a letter which was directed to Gen. Ainsworth himself, and which was sent by the Secretary of War. I submit it without comment for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the document referred to will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 14, 1912.

Maj. Gen. FRED C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant General, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: On the 15th of December last you were handed a memorandum directing you to submit to the Office of the Chief of Staff your opinion on a proposition to abolish the present separate muster roll and to so modify the form of the descriptive list, the pay roll, and other organization returns as to enable those papers to include and perform the functions of the separate muster roll. A synopsis of the proposition and its purposes was contained in the memorandum, and you were directed, in case any features of the proposition were in your opinion inadvisable or impracticable, to give a statement showing in detail wherein it was so considered inadvisable or impracticable. The said proposition was being considered by the officers of the War College and of the General Staff, with my knowledge and by my authority, as part of an effort to simplify the system of keeping military records in the War Department, and was intended to be in harmony with the efforts now being made by the President, through the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, in the direction of simplification and reform. The memorandum recited on its face that it was given to you by my direction.

In reply to this order you submitted to the Chief of Staff on February 9 a memorandum dated February 3. In this paper you impugn the fairness and intelligence of the Secretary of War, under whose authority the proposition in question was submitted to you. You also criticize and impugn the military capacity and experience, the intelligence and fair-mindedness, and, finally, question the honor and good faith of the officers of the General Staff and the War College, whose plan you were directed to discuss.

Thus, in response to my direction that you submit your opinion upon a proposition, the ultimate decision as to which rests with me, you say: "In compliance with the second part of the accompanying call, the following statement is submitted, although it is recognized that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to formulate any statement that will carry conviction to anyone who is so unmindful of consequences, or so uninformed as to the needs of the Government and the public with regard to the matter in question, as seriously to propose to abolish one of the most important, if not the most important, of all the records of the War Department. However, the statement is submitted in the confident expectation that when other, if not wiser, counsels shall prevail, and after experience with the proposed plan or any similar plan shall have shown the inevitable evil effects thereof, this statement will receive the consideration that may not be given to it now."

You say further, after quoting article 12 of the Articles of War: "It is proposed in the accompanying memorandum of the Chief of Staff to evade this requirement of law by calling the pay rolls of June 30 and December 31 'muster and pay rolls,' entering thereon the data required by article 12, yet maintaining the monthly ceremony of muster. But the adoption of this proposal could hardly fail to be regarded generally as a mere subterfuge of a kind that would be scorned by honorable men in any of the relations of private life, and that would be most discreditable to a great department of the Government in its management of the affairs of the Nation."

And further:

"The proponents of the truly remarkable plan now under discussion have betrayed a lamentable lack of knowledge of the nature and uses of our so-called descriptive list, of which it is proposed that there shall be made but a single copy, which shall follow the soldier throughout his entire enlistment. If they had had, or had profited by, even a little service as company commanders in recent years, they would have learned that our descriptive list is primarily an organization record, and the only approach to a complete record of its men that any organization has."

And again:

"The cool assurance with which it is asserted in the memorandum that 'it would make no difference' if other data could not be obtained, 'such as a complete record of extra duty, special duty, detached service,' etc., evidences such ignorance of the vital bearings that many of the data so lightly spoken of, but which, if lost, could never be supplied from any record source, have upon a multitude of pension and other claims that it would be a loss of time and effort to discuss the subject further here."

"There are other grave objections to the proposed plan that might be stated, but if these that have been pointed out are not sufficient to carry to the minds of those with whom the decision of this matter now rests the conviction not only that the proposed plan is both illegal and impracticable, but that it is most inadvisable ever to intrust to incompetent amateurs the management of business that is of nation-wide importance, and that can only be managed prudently, safely, and efficiently by those whom long service has made experts with regard to it, then it will be worse than useless to present further facts or arguments here."

"This is not an isolated instance of insubordination and impropriety on your part, nor is it made in the absence of warning as to the necessary consequences of such an outburst. On the 5th of September last you submitted to me a memorandum in which you, by insinuation, charged the Chief of Staff with improper motives in his proposed action of relieving certain officers of the recruiting service. You stated in that memorandum:

"Col. Murray and Maj. Dugan were so unfortunate as to be compelled not long ago to appear before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives for examination with regard to a bill that proposed to increase the enlistment period of the Army to five years. In response to questions addressed to them by the committee they expressed views that were at variance with views subsequently expressed to the same committee by the Chief of Staff. Considerable publicity, for which Col. Murray and Maj. Dugan were in nowise responsible, was given by the press to this difference of opinion. And, doubtless, there are those who, not knowing or not believing that the Chief of Staff is too high-minded and conscientious to permit his official action to be influenced by such a matter, will be swift to conclude, if these two officers are relieved or superseded now, that the Chief of Staff is endeavoring to punish them because they gave testimony that may be regarded as damaging to his own, and that the solicitude now manifested in behalf of a few superfluous colonels, with none manifested in behalf of superfluous lieutenant colonels, is merely a pretext for a movement whose object is to annoy or humiliate certain officers connected with the recruiting service, and to discredit the management of that service."

"Of course, any such conclusion as that referred to here would be erroneous, but it is believed to be the part of wisdom not to give Congress, the public at large, or the Army any ground upon which to base it, at least at the present time."

I, then, on September 19 wrote you from Huntington, Long Island, a personal letter of warning in respect to your conduct in submitting that memorandum, as follows:

"I only wish to add that I greatly regret and reprobate certain passages of your memorandum and of the letter which you sent me. Nothing is gained by suspecting or intimating ulterior motives on the part of those with whom we have to act in association. In an organization as large and complex as the War Department it is impossible that every action taken shall seem the wisest possible to all of the members of that department. Many orders must be given and steps taken which, to some bureau or some individual, seem ill advised and unfortunate. But in such cases and in all cases the President has a right to expect that all of the officers of the department will act as a unit, with faith in each others' motives, even if they differ as to judgments. In no other way can the morale of the Army or its organization be maintained for a moment."

In considering whether these offenses against propriety on your part are merely exceptional cases of rudeness and ill temper, I find that they have become habitual on your part and have occurred under other administrations of the War Department and concerning other officers than those of the General Staff. I find that on March 25, 1911, in a memorandum rendered by you relative to certain recommendations that had been made by various officers of the Army directed toward the end of reducing unnecessary paper work in the administration of the military organization, you used the following language:

"All these recommendations are disapproved with a few relatively unimportant exceptions hereinafter noted. Almost all of them show on the part of those making them a deplorable ignorance of, or indifference to, the requirements of law with regard to the rendition of these returns and rolls and the purposes for which they are rendered. Such ill-considered and impracticable recommendations afford convincing proof of the futility of calling upon officers of the Army generally for an expression of their views with regard to the paper work that they are required to perform."

The recommendations to which you in that memorandum thus referred had been made by 16 officers of the Army, of experience and ability, including 3 department commanders and the Superintendent of the Military Academy.

On October 16, 1906, in speaking of another general officer in the War Department, the head of one of its most important bureaus, you used in an official document the following language:

"Life is too short to permit of wasting any portion of it in discussion with, or for the benefit of, anyone whose conception of the underlying principles of military administration is so hazy that he can advocate such a proposition seriously. A proposition of this kind would be regarded as remarkable if advanced by a State militiaman, and it is simply amazing when put forward by an officer of the Regular Army, even though his connection with the military side of that establishment be so remote as to be merely nominal."

Your present action which, because of the prior warning received and the length of time consumed in the preparation of your present memorandum, must be deemed deliberate, is therefore but the culmination of a series of outbreaks evidencing such intolerance of subordination and such readiness to impugn either the motives or the intelligence of those with whom it is your duty to work in association as, if uncorrected, to destroy your usefulness in your present office. It is impossible that the business of the Government shall be properly conducted if official communications are made the occasion for contemptuous comments and aspersions upon fellow officers and for insolence to superiors. Under such circumstances self-respect would forbid that cooperation which is necessary to effective service. This is especially true in the military service, where due subordination and respect to superior officers is essential to the maintenance of discipline."

As I am myself apparently included in your latest attack, I have preferred to deem myself disqualified from judicial action thereon, and have laid the matter before the President as Commander in Chief. He directs that, pending consideration of the disciplinary measures to be taken, you be forthwith relieved from duty in your present office. You will, therefore, upon receipt of this order stand relieved of your duties in the office of the Adjutant General and will await further orders in this city. Col. H. P. McCain, Adjutant General, has been directed to assume the duties surrendered by you.

Very respectfully,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take part in the discussion which might arise upon the reading of the correspondence between the Secretary of War and the late Adjutant General. Neither the majority nor the minority members of the Committee on Military Affairs are responsible, either for the good qualities or the bad qualities of those gentlemen; but it would seem to me to be improper on my part and a dereliction of duty should I sit silent after hearing, as I have heard, the charge made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] against the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the members thereof. Since I have been a member of that committee I have carefully watched the course of its chairman, and I have come to the conclusion that no committee of this House has a better or more able chairman than the gentleman who presides over that committee. [Applause.]

I take pleasure here to-day in saying what I do, as a young member of that committee. In fact, when I started in I was designated the baby member thereof on the majority side, while my friend the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] was the baby member of the minority members of the committee, and we were given a separate table at which to consider the matters which came before us.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Infantry matter, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. However, Mr. Chairman, I was relieved from my lowly situation by the death of one of the members of the committee and was then advanced one degree.

I want also to bear testimony here to-day to my respect for the Republican members of that committee. I have followed their views in some matters, and if I had the right to speak of matters that came before the committee I could instance cases where I have voted with them. I have the highest respect for every member of that committee on the minority side and take pleasure here in testifying to it. [Applause.]

As to the matter of the late Adjutant General, I hold no brief and have no personal reason to prompt me to defend him upon this floor.

I will say this, however, for Gen. Ainsworth: Every Member of this Congress, I have no doubt, has come in contact with that gentleman in his office. He is one of the first men whom I met here in official life when I came here to assume the duties of a Congressman. He has at all times treated me courteously and kindly, and where I was in ignorance upon certain matters he has taken the time and the pains and the trouble to give me information. [Applause.] I believe him to be an upright gentleman and a good officer, and I am very sorry indeed that those higher than he in authority have seen proper to remove him from office, as evidenced by the letter which has just been read to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 49, all of section 3, beginning on line 8 down to and including line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, strike out all of section 3, from line 8 to line 13, both included.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this section if enacted into law will prevent officers and soldiers serving in the Philippines, in Alaska, on the Isthmus of Panama, and the military attachés of this Government serving abroad from receiving hereafter extra pay during their services in those places. All the nations that send troops into the Tropics allow extra pay for that service. The members of the Committee of the Whole House can readily understand that if a soldier is sent to Alaska on duty he has considerable extra expense, and therefore the Government has been allowing him extra pay during the time of that service.

Everything is so much more expensive there than it is in the Temperate Zone. The same is equally true when the soldier is sent into the Tropics; he is put to an additional expense, especially the noncommissioned officers; the commissioned officers of the military establishment are also under additional expense in Alaska and in the Tropics. Foreign Governments do not pay quite as much as we do, but the salary of officers and soldiers in foreign armies is not as great as it is in the United States, but foreign Governments allow extra pay proportionately. Business houses that send representatives into the Tropics all allow extra pay because of the extra hazardous character of the service in the Tropics.

It is known that even insurance companies charge a higher rate of premiums on insurance for the soldiers going into the Tropics, because they consider that the risk is infinitely greater. Statistics show that the percentage of mortality is greater there than in the United States proper. I feel that this allowance of double pay for this hazardous service should not be taken away from the officers and enlisted men of the Army, and I sincerely hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I understood the gentleman to say that the enlisted men and officers in the Philippines and Alaska got double pay.

Mr. KAHN. I should have said extra pay. The soldier—the enlisted man—gets 20 per cent additional and the officer 10 per cent additional. They get that extra pay.

Mr. CANNON. I thought the gentleman had made a slip of the tongue.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to oppose the amendment?

Mr. HOBSON. No; I am in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. If anyone desires to oppose the amendment he will be first recognized.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, this provision in the bill was put in because when three years ago the pay was raised it was suggested at that time by Army officers who were advocating the raise in pay that this provision of the law should then be repealed. The provision raising the pay was put on the Army bill in the Senate, and this matter was not considered and was still left in the bill. Now, it costs to maintain a soldier, the enlisted man, $705.71 a year in the United States. It costs to maintain a corporal, $776; it costs to maintain a sergeant, $859; it costs to maintain a first sergeant, $1,065.71. There are noncommissioned officers, such as battalion and regimental noncommissioned officers, who cost more, so that even in the United States it costs this country over $1,000 a year to maintain their soldiers, and counting in the pay of officers it costs about $1,200 a year in the United States and about $1,300 a year to maintain them in the Philippine Islands and in foreign service. Now, a great deal of complaint is made by the officers. I want to call attention of the committee to what the officers get. I will take, for example, a captain and show what he gets outside of his foreign-service pay. He gets $2,400 a year flat pay. If he has served for 20 years he gets $3,360. Besides that he gets four rooms, at $12 a month per room, making $48 a month for quarters, when he is stationed at posts where there are no quarters or stationed on detached duty. He gets heat and light—he gets $19.20 a month for heat and $4.16 per month for light. He gets medical attendance free; he gets his heavy furniture furnished him free. He is allowed to buy in the commissary stores his provisions at cost price.

He is allowed $150 a year if he has a horse, in order to maintain that horse, and if he has two horses he is allowed $200 a year. So the officers of the Army are well taken care of and are paid better than any other class of men for the same sort of service anywhere in the country. And the enlisted man, even the private soldier, but certainly the noncommissioned officer, has an advantage over men of the same type. And this foreign-service pay ought not, in my judgment, to be continued. And if this amendment is agreed to we will be compelled to put back in this bill $1,016,000 and add it to the appropriation this year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think there is some differentiation between the military attachés who are serving abroad and the officer serving in the regular troops, where one of the military attachés is sent to a foreign capital?

Mr. HAY. I think so, if the military attaché is a poor man. But I have been informed that the position of a military attaché to our legations abroad are such that no poor officer ever accepts it or seeks it, and the mere 10 per cent added to his pay would not enable him to accept it if it were added. I would be very glad to unite with the gentleman in increasing the pay of the military attaché if it would result in the officers who are poor or in reasonable circumstances being assigned to these duties. But I am told that an Army officer who is poor can not accept these places.

Mr. MANN. I know of one case where, I think, the military attaché, now serving at some place in China, a gentleman who used to live in the same place that I do, is not wealthy.

Mr. HAY. If he is a military attaché in China, he must necessarily be at Peking, the seat of government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. It would seem rather a hardship to send an officer to a capital where we know he will be under greater expense.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman understands that where the military attaché is so serving he has the pay of lieutenant colonel if below that rank—not sufficient at all to keep up his position at a court like that of England or Berlin or Vienna.

Mr. MANN. And I understand, although I may be mistaken about that, that his duties are in part social.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Which is somewhat expensive; and if we maintain them we ought to give them a chance to perform their duties.

Mr. HAY. I would be willing to entertain a proviso if I believed it would accomplish the purpose the gentleman has in view.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will give consideration to that before he gets through.

Mr. HAY. I certainly will.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment, and I want to say to my colleagues that it is not in the interest of the attachés abroad that I speak. They go there by choice. But I want to put in a word, when we are considering economy, and give full consideration to the equities of the case. I served about two years in the Tropics, and as a consequence of that service I was invalidated home. Six months more and I probably would have been blind. It was because of that service that I had to leave it. I know that the surgeons general of all nations recommend that their enlisted men and officers should serve not longer than a short term in such service. In most nations it is not allowed to be over two years. These officers and men are going; they are absolutely in the hands of the Government; many of them lose their minds, and it tends to undermine the nervous system. Perhaps that is the most serious result; but it also tends to undermine the whole physique. It is actually dangerous service. Now, we are not discussing here to-day the question of the pay of the Army. We are not investigating whether the pay of the Army is too high or too low, or whether it is higher than the pay of armies abroad. But we are considering here plans for the men who are serving us and that are sent to hazardous service which they are compelled to take. They go uncomplainingly. There is none of them here to be heard. But I know what they endure. The whole principle of human justice is that when you require such service of a man you ought to pay him accordingly. Why should we strain now to change the law?

Again, I will say it is done on an appropriation bill, where you can not give due deliberation to it. Why should we not, in a case where matters of efficiency of the whole service are concerned, take it on down to questions of humanity and fair justice to the man who gives you honest service? I want to ask my colleagues over here to what extent do they propose to go in a question of so-called economy? I allege that such economy as this is not economy.

But it is not on that ground alone that I would make an appeal for these men who, in the hot climates there and in the long rainy season, undergo hardships that are unknown here. We here do not conceive what they are enduring. They are having their constitutions undermined, and we are here considering the question of refusing a 20 per cent increase to the man whom we send to that duty—20 per cent to the enlisted man and 10 per cent to the officer. And here when we come into control of the Government we are going to put in the knife and cut it out. It is not fair, Mr. Chairman. It is not right. I hope this amendment will be adopted unanimously as a simple question of humanity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

So far as military attachés are concerned, I suppose that the officer who takes duty of that kind can not support himself as he ought to support himself and his family, if he has one, upon the salary allowed him. You can get along without military attachés. I have nothing to say except the bare statement. I have always supposed that details of that kind were substantially for dress-parade purposes, speaking respectfully.

But I want to say here and now that in my judgment the enlisted men and officers who serve in the Philippines and elsewhere in the Tropics are either entitled to the 10 per cent and 20 per cent increase that they get—10 per cent to the officers and 20 per cent to the men—beyond what those receive who are on duty in the United States, or else, if they are not entitled to it—and the proposition is to place them upon the same level as to pay with those who are on duty in the United States—those on duty in the United States are getting too much.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Aside from the question as to whether the pay is too big or too little, does not the gentleman think that the remedy is by seeing to it that all officers and men do their fair share of foreign service?

Mr. CANNON. All officers and men may not do their share of foreign service; but if there are people in the foreign service who do more than their share, are you going to punish them by cutting down their pay?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I am not discussing the proposition of the amount of pay, but if there be an inequality between the various men in the service, the way to correct that is to see to it that each fellow does his share of the disagreeable work.

Mr. CANNON. You are proposing to correct that abuse, if an abuse exists, by decreasing the pay of the men who do their term of duty in the Tropics and in the Philippines by cutting off their extra pay. That is double punishment, if you choose. You say you will save a million dollars if this amendment is forced into the law upon an appropriation bill. Suppose you would cut down the present pay of all officers and all enlisted men in the service generally, say 20 per cent to the officers and 10 per cent to the men; how many millions more would you save? Oh, where is the consistency of it?

I am here to say that many of the men who have done service in the Philippines for two years have returned with impaired health, and I will not by my vote, in the name of economy, do them this injustice. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] makes an appeal for the consideration of this measure, and in that appeal makes a statement that is not entirely accurate, or, I will say, he states it has not been considered. This measure was submitted last spring. We have had hearings upon the legislative features of this bill both last spring and again this winter—the winter of 1911-12.

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman will permit, he has misunderstood me, as the chairman of the committee did. When I said "railroading," I did not mean that it had not been considered. I meant that it was incorporated in an appropriation bill. I do not mean it was not considered.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the measure has been considered for more than a year, that consideration amounts to more than reasonable consideration. The gentleman asks how far we are going in this matter of economy. I say to him we are going along so far as to land us on a plane of justice to the people who are bearing all the burdens of government. We are going so far that we will be fair to the man who pays for it all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the pay of the Army has been very largely increased in the last few years. The pay and allowances of the Army are on an exceedingly liberal scale. We not only increased the pay of every officer, when we increased the pay of enlisted men a few years ago, to a point considered extravagant by every other government on earth, but within the last few years we have made additional allowances to them that are of very great value. We move their furniture for them on changes of station. We equip their quarters with furniture—and permit me to say that it has been done on a scale of extravagance that, in my judgment, was not contemplated by the committee when the law was enacted. We allow each man of a certain grade so many rooms. I will not undertake to mention those above the rank of colonel; but for a colonel we allow seven rooms, and when he is stationed at some place where there are no quarters he is given $84 a month with which to rent his rooms.

Mr. AMES. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have only five minutes, and most of that time is gone.

Mr. AMES. I will make my statement later.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Other officers receive quarters in proportion. Majors have five rooms or $60 a month, captains four rooms or $48 a month, first lieutenants three rooms or $36 a month, and second lieutenants two rooms or $24 a month. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, another important increase in pay which they receive and appreciate is the heat and light that we furnish them. Indeed, sir, there can be no complaint of illiberal treatment of the Army on the part of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, there are about 17,000 men of the Army in the Philippines.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Between 11,000 and 12,000 at the time of the last report—that is, not including the scouts and constabulary.

Mr. CANNON. With those in Alaska and in the Tropics, would that make 15,000 or 17,000?

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have the Porto Rican regiment in Porto Rico. That is a special organization.

Mr. CANNON. Let us assume that the total number is 17,000. I think that is high enough. Now, the saving by this provision in the bill would be $1,000,000 a year?

Mr. HAY. One million and sixteen thousand dollars, of which $266,000 was estimated for the officers and $750,000 for the enlisted men.

Mr. CANNON. About $1,000,000 in round numbers. Now, if the pay of the remaining 77,000 men in the Army was cut in the same proportion would it not save $5,000,000?

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman has made the calculation and says so, I will accept his statement. I have never made any such computation, because the committee has never contemplated any such action.

Mr. CANNON. That is something near the amount. Now, does the gentleman believe it would be possible, in these piping times of peace, to adopt an amendment cutting down by 10 or 15 per cent the pay of the officers and enlisted men in our fortifications, and scattered over the country, here in the United States? And if he does believe so, in God's chancellory or in man's sense of justice, would it be right?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can only say that the committee have not contemplated any action of that kind. I am discussing what we have before us.

Mr. CANNON. I think it would be much better to do that than it would be to adopt this provision, because these men have the laboring oar.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the other fellows will have the laboring oar to-morrow.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Illinois complains that this is a special hardship on officers and men serving in the Philippines, and asks why we do not make a reduction of the pay of those who are serving here. I believe his phrase was "officers at home."

Mr. Chairman, the theory of administration is that in their turn all officers in the Army will serve in the Philippines and elsewhere abroad, so that whatever burden there may be about this will not be imposed upon a peculiar and small class, nor permanently, but will be distributed among all the officers of the Army who, in their turn, will go for service in the Tropics. I protest, sir, in the name of economy and fairness to the people that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California ought not to be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have not taken any part, Mr. Chairman, in this very important bill and important discussion. I belong to that large class of American citizens who are invisible in war and invincible in peace [laughter], and I guess that some of the Military Committee belong in my class. [Laughter.]

I am not a military man, but I understand that this extra pay of the enlisted men and officers has been in force since about 1898; that for 14 years it has been the law. It seems to me not only to be a reasonable regulation, but a very humane one. I happen to be personally interested in a neighbor's son, who lives the next door to me, who is in the Philippine Islands. He has suffered greatly in his health, has been sick for months, and a short time ago, having recovered sufficiently to return to his command, was wounded in battle, and lies now wounded in that tropical country.

My close relations with that family and with other families whose sons are in the Philippine Islands has led me to feel a deep interest and sympathy for that portion of our Army that takes the double peril of foreign lands.

Men go to these foreign countries and die, and we to-day begrudge them 20 or 10 per cent extra pay that they need sometimes to keep soul and body together. It is an innovation, and with all respect to the good judgment of the committee I do consider it a mistaken economy, and hope that this amendment to strike out the section in the bill will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, first I want to say that I have absolute confidence in the honesty and sincerity of purpose of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. But, Mr. Chairman, here is a proposition which is somewhat peculiar. These boys in the Army are our boys. They come from our districts; they belong to our families; they are enlisted under the law providing that while serving in the Philippines they shall have 20 per cent increase of pay. They have taken their enlistment under that law; they are in the Philippines; they can not get out of their enlistment; they are required to serve to the end of their term; and you propose now while they are away from home, upholding the honor of the country and following the flag, to cut their pay down.

If you want to provide that these boys of ours when they enlist shall not receive so much pay, you ought to make it only applicable to those who enlist after you pass your law. But here is a proposition to cut the pay down of the people serving in the Government of the United States, who have no fixed term of office. You propose that a man having a fixed term of service—your boy in your district, the son of your constituent, serving the country abroad—shall have his pay cut down while he is abroad, and thus to violate the contract between him and the Government when he enlisted to serve three years that he would receive the pay provided by law. Many of these boys are sending money home to their mothers, to their families, and you propose to stab them in the back while they are away at the front. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN, Mr. PRINCE, and Mr. TILSON) there were 71 ayes and 68 noes.

Mr. HAY. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY, and the gentleman from California, Mr. KAHN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 73 ayes and 73 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the office establishments of the Quartermaster General, the Commissary General, and the Paymaster General of the Army are hereby consolidated and shall hereafter constitute a single bureau of the War Department, which shall be known as the bureau of supplies, and of which the chief of the supply corps created by this act shall be the head. The Quartermaster's, Subsistence, and Pay Departments of the Army are hereby consolidated into and shall hereafter be known as the supply corps of the Army. The officers of said departments shall hereafter be known as officers of said corps and by the titles of the rank held by them therein, and, except as hereinafter specifically provided to the contrary, the provisions of sections 26 and 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," are hereby extended so as to apply to the supply corps in the manner and to the extent to which they now apply to the Quartermaster's, Subsistence, and Pay Departments, and the provision of said sections of said act relative to chiefs of staff corps and departments shall, so far as they are applicable, apply to all offices and officers of the supply corps with rank above that of colonel. The officers now holding commissions as officers of the said departments shall hereafter have the same tenure of commission in the supply corps, and as officers of said corps shall have rank of the same grades and dates as that now held by them, and, for the purpose of filling vacancies among them, shall constitute one list, on which they shall be arranged according to rank. So long as any officers shall remain on said list any vacancy occurring therein shall be filled, if possible, from among such officers, by selection if the vacancy occurs in a grade above that of colonel, and, if the vacancy occurs in a grade not above that of colonel, by the promotion of an officer who would have been entitled to promotion to that particular vacancy if the consolidation of departments hereby prescribed had never occurred. The noncommissioned officers now known as post quartermaster sergeants and post commissary sergeants shall hereafter be known as supply sergeants; the Army paymaster's clerks shall be known as pay clerks, and each of said noncommissioned officers and pay clerks shall continue to have the pay, allowances, rights, and privileges now allowed him by law: Provided, That no details to fill vacancies in the grade of major in the supply corps shall be made until the number of officers of that grade shall have been reduced by 11, and thereafter the number of officers in said grade shall not exceed 46; and no details to fill vacancies in the grade of captain in the supply corps shall be made until after the number of officers of that grade shall be reduced by 31, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade shall not exceed 100; and whenever the separation of a line officer of any grade and arm from the supply corps shall create therein a vacancy that, under the terms of this proviso, can not be filled by detail such separation shall operate to make a permanent reduction of one in the total number of officers of said grade and arm in the line of the Army as soon as such reduction can be made without depriving any officer of his commission: Provided further, That whenever the Secretary of War shall decide that it is necessary and practicable, regimental, battalion, and squadron quartermasters and commissaries shall be required to perform any duties that junior officers of the supply corps may properly be required to perform, and regimental and battalion quartermaster and commissary sergeants shall be required to perform any duties that noncommissioned officers or pay clerks of the supply corps may properly be required to perform: Provided further, That such duty or duties as are now required by law to be performed by any officer or officers of the Quartermaster's, Subsistence, or Pay Departments shall hereafter be performed by such officer or officers of the supply corps as the Secretary of War may designate for the purpose: Provided further, That there shall be a chief of the supply corps, who shall have the rank of major general while so serving, and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the officers of said corps and in accordance with the requirements of section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, hereinafter cited: Provided further, That when the first vacancy in the grade of brigadier general in the supply corps, except a vacancy caused by the expiration of a limited term of appointment, shall hereafter occur that vacancy shall not be filled, but the office in which the vacancy occurs shall immediately cease and determine: "Provided further, That the supply corps shall be subject to the supervision of the Chief of Staff to the extent the departments hereby consolidated into said corps have heretofore been subject to such supervision under the terms of the existing law."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the entire paragraph, or section 4. The point of order is largely based upon what appears on page 52, beginning with line 13:

Provided further, That there shall be a chief of the supply corps, who shall have the rank of major general while so serving, and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the officers of said corps and in accordance with the requirements of section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, hereinafter cited.

On page 50, beginning at line 13, the Chair will note the following:

The officers now holding commissions as officers of the said departments shall hereafter have the same tenure of commission in the supply corps, and as officers of said corps shall have rank of the same grades and dates as that now held by them, and, for the purpose of filling vacancies among them, shall constitute one list, on which they shall be arranged according to rank.

One list is created by this section, and from that one list there shall be selected a chief of supply corps, who shall have the rank of major general. This is subject to a point of order, because it does not reduce the number of officers, it does not reduce the pay of an officer, but, on the contrary, creates a new officer with additional pay; and, it seems to me, in view of the ruling of the Chair this morning—that where one part of a paragraph or section is subject to a point of order the entire paragraph or section goes out—that the same ruling must prevail as to this, and I shall expect the Chair to hold likewise, in view of the proviso on page 52.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this is a very different proposition from the proposition considered this morning, because every part of this section and proviso referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] refers to the subject in this paragraph. This is constructive legislation, and it is legislation that is intended not only to save, which it does, but it is also intended to increase the efficiency of the Army.

I imagine that the Chair desires to know how this section will save. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this bill applies to the fiscal year beginning with July 1, 1912, and that during that fiscal year 21 officers of the Army will be cut off by the provisions of this act. That will effect a saving in this bill of $161,175. The mere fact that the provision in the bill creating a corps carries with it an increase of rank of a major general does not affect the general saving made under this section. That increase amounts to only $2,138, I believe, so that the net decrease under the section during the next fiscal year will be $161,140.44. For that reason I think the Chair should rule the section in order.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], has failed to point out in the body of the section itself where there is any retrenchment whatsoever. The saving to which he refers, if it be a saving, is in the first proviso. In the body of the section there is nothing that purports to reduce expenditures. If the section is to be considered as was the section concerning enlistment this morning when the whole section was held to be out of order because the proviso was obnoxious to the rule, then must the entire section be ruled out of order. In this instance it is the body of the section that neither makes nor purports to make any reduction in expenditures whatsoever. It simply provides for a consolidation, leaving it for the first proviso to take care of the economy, if there be economy.

I call the attention of the Chair also to the second proviso. The second proviso is purely a matter of legislation. It certainly does not purport to reduce expenditures. Following the ruling of the Chair this morning, that proviso alone would carry the whole paragraph out of the bill. The same may be said of the third proviso, which was referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], and also of the last proviso in the bill, all of them being clearly legislative matters without purporting to effect any economies whatever. So I repeat that not only the body of the section, which is the first page and a half and a little more, but the second proviso and the third and the last proviso are all properly subject to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a word. As I get the reading of the paragraph with the proviso, it seems to me to be subject to a point of order. So far as I recollect, substantially all of the decisions under the Holman rule have been that the provision itself must show upon its face, without argument, that the legislation would reduce expenditures. The gentleman says this is legislation, at least so far as providing that a major general shall be chief of this bureau. If an alleged argument would show that this reduces expenditures, then you would have legislation that would authorize an increase of salary or the creation of a place with a salary of $50,000, or any other sum. You may say that is not this case. I presume that is not this case, but the principle is the same. It is not the size of the baby, is it, if it were illegitimate? Whether it weighed 15 pounds or 5 pounds, the usual social ostracism would come. I recollect of hearing the plea once that it was such a little baby, but, after all, it was subject to the public sentiment of the community. [Laughter and applause.] It seems to me this point of order, as I gathered from the reading of the provision without having read it myself, is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will proceed to dispose of the point of order. Some of the arguments that have been advanced in the discussion of this point have been considered in two previous rulings and the Chair for the purpose of defining its attitude, will refer the committee to those rulings, without restating them in this connection. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the committee to an essential and obvious distinction between this section, and the one upon which he ruled this morning. The section ruled on this morning contained two provisions not related to each other, not dependent the one upon the other, but associated as two separate and distinct propositions. The precedents agree that when a paragraph is objected to as a whole, and any portion of the paragraph is not in order, then the point of order when sustained goes to the whole paragraph. The Chair in ruling simply followed the precedents, though the Chair must say as to these precedents, that they seem to rest on no sound or sufficient basis of reason.

But the Chair did not feel itself at liberty to overrule them. In the present case, a section is presented by the committee as a concrete whole. It is constructive legislation, in which each part bears an appropriate relation to the whole. It is an entity of independent, but related parts. It is submitted as a complete legislative proposition. This being so, it should be considered as a whole, and not in segregated items. The section is presented as a whole, and when considered as a whole, it conforms to the requirements of the Holman rule. A paragraph here, and a sentence there taken as isolated propositions, may not retrench expenditures, but the Chair does not think that a really single proposition should be picked to pieces in this manner, and destroyed in this fashion by parliamentary rulings, when as a whole the section effects a large retrenchment. This is the reverse of the proposition of this morning. In that case the point of order went to the whole section, for an independent part of it, was not in order. In this instance the point of order is not good against the whole section, for viewed as a whole it effects a considerable retrenchment, and is not subject to a point of order. The Chair will not entertain piecemeal motions unless the paragraphs to which these motions, or points of order are directed, are not parts of the complete proposition. The committee having jurisdiction has reported a concrete section, carrying independent legislation. It should be considered as such. Looking to the section as a whole, and to the correlated parts, it carries a reduction. It has not been denied in argument, that this section as a whole will effect a considerable retrenchment. The Chair is of opinion that there is a manifest and distinct difference between the pending proposition and the one upon which it ruled this morning, and that the principle which controlled the prior ruling can not be invoked in the present instance. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. It is a single amendment, and it applies to a number of places in the bill for this reason, that the amendment is to change the words "supply corps" into "quartermaster's corps." In line 19, line 22, page 49; page 50, line 8, line 13, line 16; on page 51, line—wherever it occurs in the paragraph the amendment simply is to change the words "supply corps" into "quartermaster's corps."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman if he will permit me to work the amendment out.

Mr. AMES. Oh, surely.

Mr. HAY. And therefore I ask unanimous consent that I may amend this section and that the words "quartermaster's corps" may take the place of "supply corps."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to work out the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, so that the words "quartermaster's corps" may appear in their proper place. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. For instance, there are supply sergeants, and I want to make them quartermaster sergeants, and so forth.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to page 52, line 15, to strike out the word "major" and insert the words "brigadier general," so it will read "who shall have the rank of brigadier general while so serving."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 15, strike out the word "major" and insert in lieu thereof the words "brigadier general," so that the line will read "who shall have the rank of brigadier general while so serving."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, this section, as we state in our minority views, creates a corps and puts in charge a major general who holds that rank during his continuance as head of the corps. There is also reference to a provision of law which says that a staff officer when he fills one of these places and retires shall hold a rank on the retired list that he held while filling an office to which he was assigned. If this provision becomes a law these officers will not only be major generals during the time they are holding the office, but when they retire, I take it, they will be major generals on the retired list. In this case we are putting in charge of a supply corps a major general. In the Civil War, which had 2,213,000 individual soldiers in the Federal Army, this department was managed and conducted by a brigadier general, Gen. Meigs. I can see no reason why an officer in time of peace should be put in charge of a department and made a major general. If we do this, I will say, from my long experience as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, that other bureau officers will demand that they be put in the same relative rank in which this officer is put. They want to attend the functions at the White House, and the Chief of Engineers can not well afford to be there with the insignia of a brigadier general when he has greater duties to perform and performs greater services for the country as a whole than the major general at the head of the supply corps. So he will be knocking at the door of Congress, saying, "Make me a major general so that my department will not be overshadowed by a less important department." The Chief of Ordnance will be there later on asking to be made a major general. The effect of this legislation will be to cause us considerable trouble, because these men will want to preside over their respective departments with the title of major general.

Now, this office is not large enough for that. The office of major general ought to be looked upon as a very distinguished one. He ought not to be at the head of a mere supply corps or a man who is at the head of a great grocery establishment. It ought to be so that when a man becomes a major general and wears the stars of a major general the people will say, "There goes a major general," and it will mean something when you give that title. Look at the history of our country, and consider Hancock and Meade and Halleck and Sherman and McClellan and also the splendid men of the Southland who after four years of struggle rose to the distinction of major general. You are proposing to put on the pedestal by the side of those men a distinguished hero who sits in the swivel chair of a major general.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think we should probably pay this larger salary to a major general? We are saving $700,000 by taking 20 per cent off the Philippine privates.

Mr. PRINCE. I do not know but that the gentleman is right. My colleague has a good deal of practical legislative sense. He has been here a good while.

I want to say to you that when you narrow it down to the economies in this bill they are all at the expense of the enlisted man, practically every one of them. And who is the enlisted man? Who is the commissioned officer? I heard my distinguished colleague Mr. SLAYDEN say that the people had some rights. The people? Who are these soldiers? Who are these commissioned officers? They are the people. Who are the people? Your people and my people. Where do they come from? They come from the home of the American citizen, as my distinguished associate on the floor here, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], stated to this committee a while ago. You are taking from the men who can least afford to be deprived of their salaries and are giving to the men who can best afford not to receive it.

To him that hath shall be given. From him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he seemeth to have.

It is the policy on the other side of the House to strike down the inconsequential man, strike down the enlisted man, and care for the commissioned officer who is sitting in a swivel chair. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the gentleman make that speech now four times while this bill has been under consideration. I enjoy hearing him make it very much.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; it goes better every time.

Mr. AMES. It sounds better every time.

Mr. TILSON. It is worthy of repetition.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman delivers it with a good deal of earnestness and emphasis. But, as a matter of fact, in creating this supply corps the committee has tried to make a symmetrical corps, and the pay of the enlisted men and the pay of the commissioned officer have nothing to do with the manner in which this particular section is drawn. It does not deal with the enlisted men at all.

Now, there has been a great deal said about a man sitting in a swivel chair, and my friend from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, the other day said that Gen. Aleshire was being legislated into this major generalship. I want to say for Gen. Aleshire that he has been entirely unselfish about this legislation. There is no certainty who will be the chief of the supply corps, and Gen. Aleshire has told me that so much is he impressed with the importance of this legislation to the Army that he would be perfectly willing to lose what he now has, rather than see this legislation fail. He does not care, so far as he is concerned, whether it is a brigadier general or a major general who is placed at the head of the supply corps. As a matter of fact, this supply corps will be the most important corps in the Army. The general of it will have command of about 9,000 men. He will have control of the expenditure of $80,000,000 or more. In every other army of the world the quartermaster general or the man occupying a position similar to this is either a major general or a lieutenant general.

The quartermaster general to the forces in England is a major general, and in Japan, in Germany, in France, in Austria, and all of those countries the officer occupying a position similar to this has the rank of major general.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. What rank would the officer corresponding to the Chief of Staff have in this case?

Mr. HAY. Well, in England the chief of staff is a major general, just the same as the quartermaster general is.

Mr. TILSON. And what is the size of the army there?

Mr. HAY. The size of the army is much larger, of course, than the Army here, but that has nothing to do with the rank. The gentleman asked me what was the rank of the chief of staff as compared with the rank of the quartermaster general. They are the same. And why? Because the quartermaster general is supervised by officers of the line, and it is provided in this bill that the Quartermaster General shall be under the supervision of the Chief of Staff. A line officer, after all, has supervision, so far as that is concerned, and no embarrassment will occur. Nothing will happen to mar the harmony of the War Department, I presume, now [laughter], and everybody will be dwelling there in peace and harmony forevermore. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, line 15, strike out the word "major" and insert in lieu thereof the word "brigadier," so that the line will read, "who shall have the rank of brigadier general while so serving."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "law," in line 5, on page 53, the following: "Provided, That on and after July 1, 1912, there shall not be maintained in the District of Columbia more than one disbursing office for the Signal Corps or any one of the staff departments of the Army."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called to the condition respecting disbursing officers in the Army, to which I believe the committee should give attention. There are in the District of Columbia to-day 43 quartermasters of the Army disbursing money. In addition, the Signal Corps has a disbursing one, the Engineers have one, and the Medical Corps has several. Some of the other departments have one or more. It seems to me that in the District of Columbia one quartermaster charged with the disbursement of money should be able to perform all the duties essential to the proper transaction of that office, or at least it should all be done through one office. My attention has been called to the fact that recently a requisition was made for an advance from an appropriation for a quartermaster officer at nine dollars and some cents to make a payment for which he had been detailed. It cost the Government $10 to pass on the papers permitting the advance to be made.

There are more than 1,000 officers of the Army now engaged in the work of disbursing Army funds. The Paymaster pays the compensation; the Quartermaster's Department pays the commutation for fuel and quarters, and so it runs right through the service. There is no reason whatever for a system in which such work is not concentrated and does not devolve on some few officers, by whom it could be just as efficiently performed.

The practice has grown up of detailing officers to make disbursements without any real necessity whatever. The result is that more than 1,000 accounts are maintained where perhaps from 50 to 100 would be sufficient.

I am informed that about the city of New York, within a very small radius, about 70 officers of the Army are acting as disbursing officers. I propose, if this amendment be adopted, to offer another which will prohibit the maintaining of more than three disbursing officers in any department of any of the divisions of the United States Army. There are now 10 departments, if I recall correctly, 7 of which are in the United States. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] thinks there are 11. In each one of them every division of the Army has a number of officers charged with the work of disbursing public funds. If this work were concentrated, and those who have been assigned for that purpose were detailed to other duties, there would not be this continual clamoring for additional officers, or complaints that there are not now sufficient officers to discharge the necessary functions of the Army. It seems to me that a situation such as this can very readily be corrected without impairing the public service in the slightest degree, but with very beneficial results.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Apparently quoting a question asked by the gentleman himself to-day, this bill has been under consideration now for two weeks. Why did not the gentleman call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this before?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a perfectly legitimate inquiry, and deserves a perfectly frank answer. If I were not prepared to give it, if I had anything to conceal, I would not offer the amendment. The information was furnished to me shortly after 12 o'clock to-day. It came incidentally in connection with another investigation in which I was engaged. I then pursued the inquiry and got such information as I have been able to give to the committee at this time.

Believing that an abuse existed that should not be continued, I have had prepared, by one familiar with the situation, but who is in the service of the House, and not either of the War Department or of any other executive department, several amendments which will tend very much to correct the evil of which I complain. Had I had the information earlier I should have taken the matter up with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and furnished him with all the information in my possession, as I did heretofore in connection with some other matters, and it might have induced him to accept these amendments, or it might have induced him to refuse to accept them, just as he has done heretofore. But I would not charge the gentleman from Virginia with any covert attack upon the national defense simply because I have obtained this information and I am now furnishing it to the committee for the enlightenment of its members.

Mr. HAY. I notice that the gentleman's amendment reads "disbursing office." To what does the gentleman refer? Does he refer to a civilian or an Army officer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To an Army officer.

Mr. HAY. He proposes that there shall not be maintained more than one disbursing office. That is the way his amendment reads. Now, who are employed in that office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In nearly every one of these quartermaster's offices—

Mr. HAY. The pending paragraph is in reference to a signal officer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A signal officer or any other staff officer. Wherever an officer is detailed as a disbursing officer, my information is that he usually has an enlisted man detailed to act as a clerk; and in an investigation which was recently made to determine whether and why there were delinquencies in the filing of reports required by law—and there are a great many—it was disclosed that one of the reasons assigned was that no person had been detailed to act as clerk. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he intends to move now that the committee rise?

Mr. HAY. No; I do not want the committee to rise now.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the point of order discussed and have it disposed of.

Mr. HAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether or not this provides for an Army officer or a civilian, because if it is an Army officer his amendment would not reduce expenses for the reason that the Army officer would be serving elsewhere with as much pay as he now receives.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that the amendment does not say "officer," but "office."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I mean the officers who are detailed to act as disbursing officers, and they maintain, I suppose, some organization.

Mr. HAY. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I do not see what the gentleman is trying to get at. I have not had time to look into the matter.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I have made the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman demand the regular order?

Mr. PRINCE. I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist that this amendment as worded is clearly a reduction in the number of offices maintained at public expense, and is therefore within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "law," line 5, page 53, the following:

"Provided, That on and after July 1, 1912, there shall not be maintained in the District of Columbia more than one disbursing office for the Signal Corps or for any one of the staff departments of the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed whether the existing law provides for more than one disbursing office, but suppose for argument's sake that it does. The Chair can not say that the necessary effect of the amendment will be to reduce expenses. One disbursing office might have as many officers in it, as two disbursing offices would have. The rent for a building for one disbursing office might be as great, as the rent for two buildings for two disbursing offices. This amendment does not appear to the Chair to necessarily retrench expenditures, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the quotation marks from the paragraph at the top of page 53. It ought not to be in quotation.

Mr. HAY. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out line 17, page 50, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "According to length of service."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Subsequently Mr. HAY withdrew the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed on page 50, commencing at line 13, that the section provides that the officers now holding commissions as officers of the said department shall hereafter have the same tenure of commission in the supply corps, and that officers of said corps shall have rank—and now comes the line that I want stricken out—"of the same grades and dates as that now-held by them."

I desire to substitute for that the words "according to the length of service."

It seems that in the three departments it is now sought to consolidate the promotions have heretofore been made much faster in some departments than others, and to such an extent has it gone on that there are officers whose services began some 20 years later than others and who now outrank those who have served so much longer.

The amendment I now offer seeks to correct this injustice and inequality, for I recognize the fact, as the committee doubtless found, that in preparing a measure of this kind, designed to promote economy and efficiency, it is probably necessary that some officers shall suffer to some extent for the good of the service and the good of the country. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this injustice ought not to be carried to such an extent as this section now provides.

I am not interfering with the grades of these officers at all; but this amendment undertakes to provide that these men, now in the same grade and holding the same position, shall rank according to the length of service, which seems to be only fair and just. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and the paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that all debate on the paragraph and amendment thereto be now closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, I move to amend the motion by applying it only to the pending amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that it is now after half past 5, and that the committee had better rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia is hardly amendable.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from New York how long he desires to talk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only for a few minutes.

Mr. HAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes, the gentleman from New York to occupy that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in the midst of putting to the committee the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that debate on the paragraph be now closed; and by unanimous consent the action partly taken will be rescinded.

The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed at the expiration of five minutes, the gentleman from New York to occupy that time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment pending at the present time?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, when that amendment is disposed of I propose to offer separately two amendments, which I shall send to the desk and which I shall now explain to the committee. One provides that on and after July 1, 1912, except in time of war, every officer of the Army charged with the disbursement of public money shall, before entering upon such duty, give bond in such form and with such security as the Secretary of War may approve. All paymasters in the Army are now required to give bond. In addition to the paymasters, however, there are a great many officers of the Army, who are charged with the disbursement of public funds, who are not required to give bonds. They have to their credit on deposit in various parts of the country and outside of the United States sums aggregating in the millions of dollars. There is no good reason for not requiring the security that is required from every other official in the service. More than that, if such a provision were enacted it would prevent the detail of officers to act as disbursing officers in so many cases as now exist, as I have already pointed out.

Another amendment which I shall offer provides that on and after July 1, 1912, there shall not be maintained more than three disbursing offices in any department of any of the divisions of the United States Army, and no disbursing office shall be so established and maintained except with the written approval of the Secretary of War. I have not had time to obtain the facts connected with every department of the Army, but about the city of New York there are in the neighborhood of 70 officers of the Army who are disbursing funds appropriated for the support of the Army. My information is that at least 1,000 officers of the Army are detailed to act, or are acting either by detail or under the operation of law, for the purpose of disbursing funds appropriated for the support of the Army, and that the adoption of both of these amendments would result in the concentration of this work, improving the efficiency of the service, and releasing a number of officers for the discharge of the duties which under the law properly devolve upon them.

I hope that when the amendments are offered from the desk the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], who is so well informed about the Army, and who has shown that he is anxious to eliminate abuses in the administration of the Army, and who is sincere in his efforts to effect reforms, will unite with me to secure their adoption. They are for the benefit of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment to be voted on is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Line 5, page 53, add the following:

"On and after July 1, 1912, except in time of war, every officer of the Army charged with the disbursement of public money shall, before entering upon such duty, give bond in such form and with such security as the Secretary of War may approve."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, to that I make a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that the gentleman from Illinois desired to improve the efficiency of the service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order, unless the gentleman from New York is discussing the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was preliminary. But some people can not get started as quickly as others.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman will have to get started very soon, or I shall make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have concluded my argument on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] makes the point of order on this amendment. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Line 5, page 53, add the following:

"On and after July 1, 1912, there shall not be maintained more than three disbursing offices in any department of any of the divisions of the United States Army and no disbursing office shall be so established or maintained except with the written approval of the Secretary of War."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 5. That as soon as practicable after the creation of a supply corps in the Army not to exceed 4,000 civilian employees of that corps, receiving a monthly compensation of not less than $30 nor more than $175 each, not including civil engineers, superintendents of construction, inspectors of clothing, clothing examiners, inspectors of supplies, inspectors of animals, chemists, veterinarians, freight and passenger rate clerks, employees of the Army transport service and harbor-boat service, and such other employees as may be required for technical work, shall be replaced permanently by not to exceed an equal number of enlisted men of said corps, and all enlisted men of the line of the Army detailed on extra duty in the supply corps or as bakers or assistant bakers shall be replaced permanently by not to exceed 2,000 enlisted men of said corps; and for the purposes of this act the enlistment in the military service of not to exceed 6,000 men, who shall be attached permanently to the supply corps and who shall not be counted as a part of the enlisted force provided by law, is hereby authorized: Provided, That the enlisted force of the supply corps shall consist of not to exceed 15 master electricians, 600 sergeants (first class), 1,005 sergeants, 650 corporals, 2,500 privates (first class), 1,190 privates, and 45 cooks, all of whom shall receive the same pay and allowances as enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Signal Corps of the Army, and shall be assigned to such duties pertaining to the supply corps as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may fix the limits of age within which civilian employees who are actually employed by the Government when this act takes effect and who are to be replaced by enlisted men under the terms of this act may enlist in the supply corps: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be held or construed so as to prevent the employment of the class of civilian employees excepted from the provisions of this act or the continued employment of civilians included in the act until such latter employees have been replaced by enlisted men of the service corps.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order—

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against that section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriations for the Army, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 8853. An act for the relief of John L. Baird; and

H. R. 14055. An act to provide for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and for other purposes.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the act (S. 4728) to authorize a change of name of steamer Salt Lake City, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the Army appropriation bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not finished. To-morrow is private-claims day, and it was my intention to ask for the further consideration of what is known as the omnibus war-claims bill, but I have agreed with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, providing we can get unanimous consent of the House to do so, that this bill may be finished to-morrow and then that the war-claims bill be taken up immediately after this bill is finished, provided it is finished before the day is over, and also be proceeded with during Saturday or until it is finished, if finished on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the omnibus war-claims bill be taken up immediately following the conclusion of the Army appropriation bill instead of coming up to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. And also be in order on Saturday.

Mr. MANN. And also be in order on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Both to-morrow and be in order on Saturday, if not finished to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, February 16, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] rises to a question of personal privilege, which he will state.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have this extract read—

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. It is necessary for the Chair to hear, in order to determine whether a question of personal privilege is presented or not.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have this communication from the Philadelphia Inquirer of yesterday morning, the 15th instant, read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES EXPERTS SENT OUT CAMPAIGNING—ENGINEER TELLS OF BEING ASSIGNED TO CONGRESSMEN SEEKING REELECTION—EVERGLADES SCANDAL PROBES HEAR OF PRACTICE OF AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT IN SOUTHERN STATES.

WASHINGTON, February 14.

The House inquiry into the Florida Everglades was enlivened to-day by testimony to the effect that the Department of Agriculture in times past had sent some of its experts on campaign tours with Congressmen seeking reelection.

J. O. Wright, formerly in the department, but now chief drainage engineer of the State of Florida, called to explain his reports on the Everglades, said that in 1908 he was detailed to accompany Representative JOHN H. SMALL, of North Carolina, a Democrat, to Washington, N. C., during a campaign.

Four other Agricultural Department employees, he said, went along. There was an expert on soils, one on plant industry, a corn expert, and a cotton expert. The Government paid the expenses, Mr. Wright said. He said Representative SMALL introduced them to the crowds and told them to wait until the "finish, as he had something important" to tell them.

The concluding remarks of Mr. SMALL, Wright said, were of a political nature. In his own speeches Wright said he gave Mr. SMALL credit for legislation.

Other candidates he had helped, he said, were Representatives GODWIN and THOMAS, of North Carolina; Representative RANDELL, of Louisiana; and another Representative, from the Shreveport district, whose name he had forgotten.

"The Everglades are still unreclaimed," said Wright. "A very small portion is under cultivation. Most of that part of the Florida Peninsula is incapable of cultivation, because it has not been drained."

Representative SMALL, of North Carolina, appeared before the committee to explain the trips through his district. He said politics did not enter into the lectures or discussions and that diffusion of knowledge was the aim.

Chairman Moss asked Solicitor McCabe, of the department, if the practice of sending Government employees into congressional districts had been discontinued. Mr. McCabe said it had not; but insisted there was no politics in it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if the gentleman asks unanimous consent, but I suggest the paper read presents no question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he does not think that charges that a Congressman or Representative was using the benefits of the Agricultural Department for personal and political promotion is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. OLMSTED. It only states that an officer of the department delivered a lecture, or something, down in his district. It does not say it was political.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the gravamen of the charge is that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] imported these agricultural agents down into his district for the purpose of helping to reelect him to Congress.

Mr. SMALL. And in a political campaign.

The SPEAKER. And in a political campaign. The Chair thinks it is a question of privilege, as it reflects on the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] in his representative capacity.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, the inference or imputation which may be drawn from this newspaper publication to the effect that there was the slightest impropriety in the conduct of this or other agricultural meetings in my district—the first congressional district of North Carolina—is utterly unfounded and untrue. And in order to correct the injustice which has been done to myself, and also, and not the least, to correct an injustice which has been done to the Department of Agriculture, I have risen to this question of privilege in order to state the truth. My district is largely agricultural. I think the census shows that at least 80 per cent of the population are directly dependent upon the farm for their support. Under those conditions it was the bounden duty of the Representative of those people to utilize, in as far as he could legitimately, the services of every executive department of this Government for their benefit. And the Agricultural Department, naturally, was capable of rendering them the greater service. When I was first elected to this House, in 1898, and began to observe the line of activities in which I could be most useful, of course I came to the conclusion that, the agricultural interests being the dominant industry, should receive particular consideration.

I observed at the same time that they were not availing themselves of the manifold activities of this department. Only in a slight degree were the publications of that department disseminated and read, and in very few instances were the experts of that department called upon by individuals or organizations to aid them in the improvement of agricultural methods. I concluded that the best method of utilizing the department was by bringing to those people experts from that department, to meet them face to face and to discuss with them agricultural problems. So, therefore, beginning about 1905, it was determined to have annual meetings in the summer, during July and August, which would be held at each county seat in my district. There are 14 counties in the district, but 1 of them being exclusively, almost, a fishing county, only 13 were visited. Through the Secretary of Agriculture and the chiefs of several bureaus experts were detailed to visit the district as lecturers and conduct these meetings.

One of the vital problems in my district is that of drainage. There are 500,000 acres of unreclaimed swamp land in that district, most of which have been pronounced by experts in the Bureau of Soils as being exceedingly fertile. One of them in his report stated that much of these lands were as fertile as the Delta of the Mississippi.

There is almost an equal area of land which has been under cultivation for many years, even for generations—some for 100 years—which, by reason of its slight elevation above tide level has never been efficiently drained. Therefore, among others, I made application for a lecturer to talk upon the subject of drainage, and through the Secretary and Dr. A. C. True, the director of experiment stations, Mr. J. O. Wright was detailed to discuss that subject. Up to that time I had never met Mr. Wright. Those meetings have been continued from year to year each summer since that time, and, as I remember, during the summers of 1905, 1906, and 1907 Mr. J. O. Wright accompanied the party and discussed drainage.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture are now conducting an investigation arising out of the charge that certain reports of investigations by the Office of Drainage Investigations of the Department of Agriculture had been suppressed. Two days ago Mr. J. O. Wright was upon the stand, and upon the inquiry being propounded to him as to the reason why some reports had not been formulated at an earlier date gave as one excuse that he had been detailed for this work in my district. I was informed when the matter was mentioned, and I went down to the committee and made a statement.

Now, the facts connected with those meetings, so far as this inference goes, are these: There was never injected into those meetings in the slightest degree any political or partisan discussion. I realized the proprieties, and not only upon my own part endeavored to avoid any reference to partisan matters but stated to each one of these gentlemen that I desired any political references to be eschewed. They observed the request. Not only were no politics discussed, nor were there any politics in it, but, on the contrary, I never inquired about, and I do not know to-day, the political affiliations of a single lecturer sent out by the department to attend these meetings. Nor did we even in private conversation discuss any political subject. It is strange, indeed, when a Representative can not utilize one of these executive departments for the betterment of his people without a charge being made that it is being done for ulterior political purposes. These meetings were held not in campaign years alone, but even in such years they were held long before the campaign began. They were held every year consecutively, and, in so far as I can induce the Department of Agriculture to do so, these meetings will be continued. They have resulted in great benefit to the people of the district.

Time after time comments have come, both oral and written, of the great service which has been rendered to agriculture by the introduction of improved methods, and of the betterment of those who live upon the farms by the teaching and the instruction which have been given at these meetings. Some reference was made in the hearing before the committee to similar meetings held in the congressional district of Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of Louisiana, and other Members. My information, derived from reputable sources, justifies me in the statement that all other meetings have been conducted on the same high plane and that the only purpose was to bring benefit to the farmer and to introduce better farm methods.

Mr. Speaker, these inferences and these innuendoes involve an injustice to the Department of Agriculture. So far as I am concerned, I take pleasure in stating that the administration of that department in the South has been free from political bias. [Applause.] There has never been at any time any act or suggestion upon the part of any official of the department that any benefit should be withheld from my district or from my State because the majority there happens to be of a different political faith from the majority controlling the administration under which this department was conducted.

This dispatch, so far as I have been able to observe, was sent out by the Associated Press alone. I do not propose to exhibit any feeling or to make any charges against the correspondent who is responsible for it; but, Mr. Speaker, I submit that those who are responsible for the dissemination of the news through the Associated Press, upon which so many newspapers are dependent for obtaining news of events at the National Capital, should be more careful and discriminating in the character of the news which they send out.

To show how little excuse there was for this communication, on Wednesday, when this matter came to my attention, I went before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture and asked leave to interrupt the testimony of Mr. Wright, and made substantially the same statement as I have made to-day within less than an hour after the reference of Mr. Wright had been made to myself in his testimony; and at the conclusion of my statement I turned to Mr. J. O. Wright, the witness, and asked him if my statement was correct, and asked him if he had any information to the contrary, either direct information or by inference, to please state it then and there, and at that moment he said that my statement was absolutely correct. While I had not heard what occurred, the chairman of the committee interjected the statement immediately thereafter that there was no substantial difference between the statements of the witness, Mr. J. O. Wright, and those of myself, so that it can be readily seen that this dispatch, sent out by the Associated Press, was absolutely without foundation and absolutely inexcusable.

I have not sought to raise this question of privilege so much on account of myself as to remove any imputations which might involve an injustice to the Department of Agriculture.

Before concluding I desire, in order that I may not be misunderstood, to make this further statement: I know nothing about the immediate matter that is under investigation by his committee relating to the suppression of any report upon the investigation of the Everglades in Florida, and it was an impertinence to have injected this immaterial matter into that investigation in any way whatever. I have my own opinion, and I state this for fear of misunderstanding as to the action of the department in dismissing two officials—Mr. C. G. Elliott, the chief of the drainage investigations, and his assistant, Mr. Morehouse. I think, if I understand the facts correctly, that a grave injustice was done to them and that the action was taken under a serious misapprehension of the facts.

I simply interject that statement by way of parentheses and in order to avoid any misunderstanding; but upon the lines upon which I have spoken, upon which this communication rests, I desire in the strongest and most emphatic manner to deny any insinuations or any statements of fact which may tend to support any inference that there was in the slightest degree politics injected into those meetings or that the Department of Agriculture was responsible in the least degree for the making of campaign material and the furtherance of my political interests. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting an interview that I gave.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SHERWOOD PENSION BILL.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD an editorial in the Aurora (Ill.) Beacon News, of February 13, 1912, commenting upon the Sherwood pension bill. I only wish to say at this time that I am firm in the belief that the Smoot substitute will be very unsatisfactory to the old veterans, who were well pleased with the Sherwood bill as it passed in the House. The old soldiers believe that the Sherwood bill is the best and most meritorious bill that has ever been considered by Congress. Their disappointment over the defeat of the Sulloway bill was very great, and now that the Sherwood bill has been sidetracked for a substitute that is a mere pretense, it is very discouraging to these brave old veterans who are dying at the rate of 100 per day. There will be an accounting in store for those who are responsible for this threatened defeat of the Sherwood bill that will be as severe as it is deserved. The editorial referred to reads as follows:

HUMILIATING THE OLD SOLDIER.

Only a short time ago at a mass meeting of citizens in Aurora resolutions were adopted calling upon the Senate of the United States to further help to pay the debt of gratitude we owe the veterans of the Civil War by passing the Sherwood bill.

This mass meeting was a nonpartisan affair. A Republican Member of Congress, a Republican ex-United States Senator, a present Democratic candidate for governor of Illinois, and a present Democratic candidate for member of the State legislature spoke in favor of the bill, while a mayor elected on a nonpartisan ticket without opposition presided.

Yesterday the Senate Committee on Pensions threw out the Sherwood bill which the Aurora people indorsed and offered a substitute proposed by Senator REED SMOOT, of Utah, denying to the old soldier his honest due.

Great God! Must men now in need of the barest comforts in life crawl as suppliants before a rich Utah banker, whose wealth piled up for him because his daddy basked beneath the smiles of Brigham Young?

Must these men who went to the front when they were mere boys and whose locks are now tinged with the gray of honest toil be thus humiliated by one who, when they bared their breasts to the enemy's fire, was pulling at the rubber nipple on a milk bottle?

No! A thousand times, no!

Better far a century of penury than an hour of ingratitude!

Illinois expects her Senators to do their duty.

The old veterans are not only deserving of all that the Sherwood bill would give them, but they are poor and needy. I have no doubt that more than half of the old soldiers depend wholly upon their pensions and have no other income. Not 1 in 20 can earn a cent. I received this letter to-day:

NEW PHILADELPHIA, OHIO, February 12, 1912.

Mr. ASHBROOK.

KIND SIR: Will the old soldier get any more pension or are we turned down again? I don't know how we can live if we don't. I get $15 per month and we have not had a pound of butter in our house since Thanksgiving. Forty cents for butter, 40 cents per dozen for eggs, $1.40 per bushel for potatoes, 30 cents for coffee, etc. How can we live on $15 per month? We are just out of coal and it has been raised 10 cents per bushel, and I only have 50 cents to my name. I don't drink or smoke or chew. I served over three years and was in some of the worst battles, was shot, and yet I only get $15. Please help us soon.

Your friend,

RICHARD DODGE.

This is only one of the many pathetic appeals that daily pour into the hands of the Members who represent soldier constituencies. To me it seems nothing short of a crime to delay, postpone, and defeat all pension legislation and permit these old veterans, who preserved this Union, to suffer for the bare necessities of life during their declining days and die in want, when by the passage of the Sherwood bill practically every soldier would be able to at least live.

That the old comrades are dissatisfied with the Smoot substitute, which means little and to but few, is shown by the following extracts from veterans just received:

Albert L. Calloway, of Quitman, Mo., a soldier who enlisted early in the war and was mustered out in 1865, writes:

It would be much better to let legislation stand as it is than to pass one of the McCumber propositions.

A letter from Webster, N. Y., signed by Veteran C. E. Clark, says:

I notice by the McCumber invention he only makes $3 per month difference between a man who served three years and three months and the man who served three months. I served three years and three months, and, at 66 years, he rates me at $18 per month, while the man that served three months he rates, at 68 years, at $15 per month. His invention No. 18 would have been a great deal better, but there is no justice in such propositions. Better let the pension law stand as it is.

Thomas Rayson, of Circleville, Ohio, says:

Stand by your guns. The proposed Smoot amendment would be of no value—only to a very few old men. Stick to the original bill.

Col. E. P. Lee, of Minneapolis, Minn.:

Senator McCUMBER has formulated a pension bill to substitute for the Sherwood bill. This bill does not meet with the approval of the old veterans, and I hope when the bill goes to conference that Gen. SHERWOOD will refuse to accept the McCumber bill.

John F. Lewis, of Great Bend, Kans., writes:

This is the first and only Congress that has shown proper military instinct in the pension business, and I hope you will stand by your guns, whether the bill passes or not, as it is a true standard and our Government must come to it sooner or later. Every vestige of patriotism must be dug out of the Army, if for no other reason but that of its influence upon the rising generation. A service bill passed for the old Civil War soldiers should be an honor roll and not a pauper list.

Mr. Lewis was first sergeant of Company G, One hundred and seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, a veteran regiment of 30 battles.

Joel R. Harvey, of Newcastle, Ind., says:

I want to say to you I am 66 years old, enlisted for three years on December 22, 1861. First vote for Lincoln, second term, when I was 19. Never voted anything but Republican ticket since. Cleveland's administration, in my opinion, was better than Taft's. Cleveland never allowed his Cabinet officers to discredit the soldiers.

M. B. Main, of Chicago, Ill., a prominent soldier and good citizen, writes to Gen. SHERWOOD:

I note with extreme regret that the Senate Committee on Pensions have seen fit to turn down your excellent measure and indorse the Smoot substitute, a measure, by the way, which means nothing to our suffering comrades, as most of them will be dead and buried long before it comes into operation. It is evident to any thinking man that this measure was put forward merely to rob the Democratic Party of any credit they would receive of the passage of the original measure. I think I but voice the sentiment of the Grand Army of the Republic when I say, rather than see this substitute adopted we would prefer to see the original measure go down to defeat. We are standing upon the principle of right and justice, and if the Republican Senate sees fit to ignore our claims, let them bear the consequences, which, we believe, will not tend to advance popularity of this party; so I hope the friends of the Sherwood service-pension bill will consider no compromise on the measure, but insist on its passage in its original form.

Comrade P. A. Malone, Twenty-second Illinois Veterans, writing from De Soto, Mo., February 14, says:

Under the Smoot substitute a soldier has to wait for full benefit until he is 75 years old. Why should a comrade who has served three years wait that long? It is a mere aggravating promise that only a very few will ever realize.

From Washington Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Chicago, Capt. W. Hirsch writes as follows. Capt Hirsch is a three-year veteran:

What we want is the Sherwood bill or none. I speak the sentiments of 96 members of our Post.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is in session for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to address the Committee of the Whole on a matter relating to this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may address the Committee of the Whole for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the growth of socialism the world over, it is of general interest and of importance to the country to know the position of the Socialists as to standing armies and navies.

To begin with, I want to say most emphatically that the Socialists do not want our people to be defenseless or to be depending upon the good will of any other nation at any time. We want the people of our country to be in a position to take care of themselves at all times. We know that treaties and written instruments are of very little account if they are not backed up by sufficient force and power.

Furthermore, we know that no nation in history that was totally disarmed ever remained a free nation. We know that whenever a nation was conquered, the first measure taken by the conquerors was to disarm the conquered. We know all that.

Therefore, I want to state to the Committee of the Whole that I believe in an armed nation—armed, however, for defense only. I believe in a people invincible for defense, but slow, awkward, and of no use for conquest or aggression.

A standing army, gentlemen, means a standing preparation for war. There are better things to prepare for than war.

We are spending nearly $400,000,000 annually in preparation for war or as the result of former wars, while we are spending only $200,000,000 annually for education in this country. The figures which I have given do not include the expenditures for the militia of the various States.

It is useless for certain very well meaning men to cry "Peace, peace, peace," when they are voting millions and millions of dollars every year for war. We will finally get what we are preparing for.

Why should the United States prepare for war? Who is going to attack us? Are the Canadians going to attack us? Will the Mexicans attack us?

I heard a Member from Texas tell in a private conversation the other day that in case of any trouble with Mexico, Texas alone, without any assistance from the rest of the country, could whip our southern neighbor. [Applause.] I believe it. And I believe that in case the Canadians should try to conquer the United States, Wisconsin and Minnesota could do the job of taking care of them, even without help from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BERGER. With pleasure. But remember, please, I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I understand; but I think this is a statement that ought to be made. The gentleman is mixing up his States a little bit. There is an impression in Mexico that they could easily lick the United States if it was not for Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. BERGER. I am just telling the House that Texas alone could take care of the job.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us which side he is on?

Mr. BERGER. If the gentleman from Illinois will just wait until I get through he will find out all right. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, from the rest of the world we are separated by two great oceans. In other words, we are in a better position to dispense with standing armies than any other nation in the world's history ever was. There is no question about that.

We also have had the yellow peril pictured before us. I say no invading army—yellow, black, or white—will ever leave this country in any other way except as released prisoners. There can be no question about that. [Applause.]

But there is one thing of which I am seriously afraid. A standing army always brings before my vision the danger of the man on horseback. No republic in the history of the world has ever very long survived a standing army. There is the real danger, gentlemen.

Yet the tendency of our legislation is in favor of a standing army. Here are the figures. In 1898 the Army appropriation was only $23,129,344.

Then came the Spanish War. Since then the appropriations have grown to the neighborhood of $100,000,000. In spite of a reduction in the last two years' appropriation the amount we are now asked to vote for is the amount total of $93,374,755.97.

In 1890 the appropriation for fortifications was $1,233,594. For 1912 we are asked to give $5,473,707.

Now, as to the Navy. In 1890 the Navy appropriation was $21,692,510.27. This year we are asked for $126,478,338.

Pensions have also grown since 1890. At that time the appropriation was $89,758,700. For the year 1912, almost 50 years after the close of the Civil War, we are paying $153,682,000.

A nation that is all the time preparing for war, like we do, will sooner or later have a war.

Let us compare this condition of things with Switzerland. Switzerland is a republic, but Switzerland is in a particularly difficult position, being surrounded by Germany, France, Italy, and Austria—four countries with large standing armies. There are three different languages spoken in Switzerland—German is spoken by about two-thirds of the population, French by one-fourth, and 10 per cent speak Italian. It is true that Switzerland's neutrality is guaranteed by the great European powers, but this would amount to very little in case of a European war.

However, Switzerland is well able to take care of itself against any attack. It relies entirely upon the national militia. The service in this force is compulsory and universal, except for physical disability. Those excused or rejected pay certain taxes.

Actual service begins at the age of 20. The first 12 years are spent in the "Auszug," or the "Elite"; the next eight years in the "Landwehr"; the remaining eight years in the "Landsturm" for all those who have gone through the "Elite" and the "Landwehr."

Now, I shall disregard entirely the "Landsturm," which consists of about 50,000 men who have served 20 years in the army. The military strength of Switzerland, with a population in 1890 of but 3,741,971, is as follows:

	Men.
The "Elite," or "Auszug"-----	140,000
The reserve, or "Landwehr"-----	135,000
Total war strength-----	275,000

I may say that Switzerland is in a most excellent position to take care of itself against any attack from any side, whatever it may be.

Yet Switzerland has no standing army. The initial training of the Swiss militia is carried out in recruiting schools. The schooling period is now 65 days for the infantry, engineers, and foot artillery; 75 days for field artillery; and 90 days for cavalry, of which Switzerland has only about 5,000.

The subsequent training, called the "repetition course," is 11 days annually. But after going through seven courses further attendance is excused for all men under the rank of sergeant. The "Landwehr" men are called out only once for training during the entire eight years.

But every Swiss militiaman must serve a rifle course annually during the entire 20 years. There are numerous shooting societies and shooting ranges all over the country for that purpose.

The expenditures for that "army of democracy" are by no means small; they amount to 40,000,000 francs yearly, or $8,000,000. Switzerland is surrounded by great nations with immense standing armies. That must be taken into consideration.

Switzerland, however, has no standing army. The Swiss militia is more like the armed democracy of ancient republics than any other military institution in the world. It surely could never be used by any usurper against the people.

We should have such a system here. Both Washington and Jefferson believed in a citizen soldiery and a mere skeleton of an army. In Washington's time the Regular Army was reduced to about 2,000 men.

The force under Gen. Anthony Wayne, that broke the Indian power at the Maumee Rapids in 1794, was composed of men specially recruited for that purpose. Subsequently the Regular Army was increased somewhat, but it was again reduced—this time to 3,000 men—under Thomas Jefferson.

We could readily and without any harm to ourselves reduce our regularly employed Army to the 25,000 officers and men which constituted its strength from shortly after the Civil War until 1898.

That Army was sufficient to quell the Sioux, the Apaches, and the Utes and other Indians. It will be more than sufficient for any present need, since the last Indian war has been fought. Instead of voting $93,000,000 that could be better used in a thousand other ways, this Congress should organize a military system like that of the Swiss, and select a commission of trained military men to carry the measure into effect.

I shall, therefore, Mr. Chairman, vote against the entire bill, no matter what amendments are made to it, because as a matter of principle I am opposed to standing armies.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, I will ask him to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman favor a three-year or a five-year enlistment?

Mr. BERGER. A three-year enlistment, under the circumstances, because it smacks a little less like a Russian army. However, I shall vote against the entire appropriation bill. If you could make the term of enlistment three months, I would favor that still more, of course, and vote for it.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman believe that we should have a number of men trained in military service, and have those men go back to the body of the people to engage in peaceful pursuits, rather than to have them remain permanently as a part of the military establishment?

Mr. BERGER. I favor every citizen being trained in military knowledge. I favor every man being made capable of and trained to defend our freedom in case of need. And I am also in favor of every citizen engaging in useful and peaceful pursuits permanently. I am against all standing armies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman favor 15 regiments of Cavalry or 10?

Mr. BERGER. I believe the days of cavalry have passed. As far as I have studied the question, cavalry can only be used to cover the movements of the army or to discover the movements of the enemy. We read that in Tunis the Italians use balloons and aeroplanes for that purpose. The usefulness of the horse in war is fast waning. The automobile and the aeroplane are taking its place.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] stated that very nicely the other day by telling the story of Mars-la-Tour in 1870. That was the last time cavalry has ever attacked infantry. Four French cavalry regiments were wiped out in less than an hour like snow upon a hot July day. These regiments were the flower of the French Army, and the Germans did not have nearly as good rifles as we have now. You can not use cavalry any more against infantry or artillery.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman is in favor of cutting the regiments down from 15 to 10.

Mr. BERGER. Decidedly; because you will save money and you will surely save human life in case of action.

Mr. CANNON. What did the gentleman say was the expenditure for military purposes in Switzerland?

Mr. BERGER. Eight millions of dollars.

Mr. CANNON. What is the population of Switzerland?

Mr. BERGER. Almost 4,000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, Switzerland is surrounded by the most powerful standing armies in the world. We are not. Switzerland must be prepared to fight for its integrity. I am willing to spend a great deal of money for defense, but none for conquest.

Mr. WEEKS. I was going to ask the gentleman what would be the expenditure for our Army per capita if we expended as much as Switzerland does for its militia. It would be double our present appropriation.

Mr. BERGER. No, sir, it would not; because Switzerland does not spend anything for the Swiss navy. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that a point of order was pending when the committee rose on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. HAY. I would like to know whether it is going to be insisted upon.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman to state his point of order, or make it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order because the section changes existing law in violation of the Holman rule. The portion of that rule applicable to the pending question is as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

A reading of section 5 makes clear the fact that it does not, upon its face, show that it would reduce expenditures and come within this rule. To demonstrate that the section would reduce expenditures would require the taking of testimony, and very probably an absolute contradiction in the statements of witnesses as to whether there would be a retrenchment, and thus necessarily throw upon the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole the determination of this question of fact. No person on reading the section could tell that it would retrench expenditures. As I say, it would throw the whole burden of determining the deciding question of fact as to whether the section retrenched expenditures—the fact upon which the rule turns—upon the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and that certainly can not be the proper procedure of the House under this rule.

General appropriation bills, furnishing supplies upon which the very existence of the Nation may depend, ought not to be complicated with legislation proposing to change existing law, unless very clearly, upon the reading of the bill itself and without hearing witnesses the proposed legislation comes within the provisions of the rule, and then only in the manner provided by the rule itself.

This section creates 6,000 new positions in the Army. While, Mr. Chairman, it replaces not to exceed 4,000 civilian employees and an indefinite number of enlisted men in the line of the Army, it certainly is not apparent that it will retrench expenditures in any manner or degree whatever. In certain hearings on May 18, 1911, before the Committee on Military Affairs, on House bill 7713, Sixty-second Congress, a bill making similar provision for a general service corps of enlisted men, on page 22 and following there appears testimony to the effect that economy will result from the substitution of military for civil labor in the Army. But, Mr. Chairman, a close inspection of this testimony reveals the fact that in computing the cost of the proposed military organization, no estimate or allowance was made by the witnesses who gave their testimony for the following items:

1. Officers' work to control and attend to 6,000 enlisted men, including court-martial work. That is a necessary expense, and should be estimated for always.

2. There was no estimate made in the testimony of the witnesses that this bill would retrench expenditures for those who will be detailed to care for the rest—for example, cooks, clothing issues, clerks for pay and muster rolls, barrack orderlies, and so forth.

3. No estimate was allowed for losses by desertion. Five hundred would desert annually if the proportion were the same as in the rest of the Army. These men are to be enlisted as other men are enlisted, and presumably there will be the proportionate average number of desertions.

4. No allowance was made for losses by discharge by court-martial, of which the average number is 230 annually.

5. No allowance was made for the support and guarding of prisoners. About 300 would always be prisoners to be supported and guarded, supposing that the men who are to be enlisted under section 5 would furnish the average number of prisoners.

6. No allowance was made for cost of transportation. Under the law as it now exists civil employees are picked out where needed and discharged when they are no longer required. This would not be the case with soldiers regularly enlisted who take the place of civilian employees, and this additional expense ought to be allowed for.

7. No allowance was made for those soldiers who are idle, waiting assignments between jobs or by reason of illness.

8. No allowance was made for pensions to those incurring disability in the line of duty.

9. No allowance was made for quarters. These were insufficiently provided for in the estimates of witnesses.

It is quite apparent that all these items should have been taken into account, but there is nothing in section 5 to show that they were taken into account, and they were not. It can not be determined whether section 5 would decrease expenditures, except by the taking of the testimony of witnesses, and this, as I say, would throw the whole burden of determining this vital question of fact upon the Chairman, whereas it ought to be left to the Chairman to decide it by a perusal of the section itself and a comparison of it with existing law.

It is true, moreover, that public policy demands the employment of civil labor—I speak now of the question of policy—rather than military labor, wherever it is practicable and economical. The greater the use of civil labor the more rapidly a given number of men can be placed in line of battle when war occurs. In time of war all men enlisted and trained at the Government's expense, with provision for pension and retirement, should be in the fighting line. That, however, goes to the question of policy.

I made the point of order because section 5 is new legislation on a general appropriation bill, and the section on its face does not show that it would reduce expenditures, but, on the contrary, leaves that vital question of fact to be determined from the testimony of witnesses, and is therefore not within the Holman rule.

The decision of this question by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would be only his opinion, and that opinion might be entirely at variance with the fact, whereas the Holman rule plainly means, as it ought to mean, that it is to be applied only where there can be no mistake as to the fact.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, under existing law there are now employed annually by the Quartermaster General and Commissary General, and other bureau chiefs in charge of these different supply corps, 4,832 civilian employees. There are also detailed to their command 2,478 enlisted men on extra duty in the Quartermaster and Subsistence Departments. These soldiers are paid from 35 cents to 50 cents per day. This legislation, if enacted, will reduce the expenditures of the Government one million nine hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars a year when all of these people become enlisted men; and in the next fiscal year, if 1,000 men are employed in place of soldiers and civilians, we will reduce the expenditures $368,000 per year.

This calculation has been very carefully made by the Quartermaster General. There is no question about the reduction. There is no doubt that this saving can be made and will be made if this law is passed. I therefore think that it is within the Holman rule, and believe that the point of order should be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated somewhat in extenso its opinion of the proper construction of section 2 of Rule XXI. It is impossible, in view of existing law, and having in mind at once the cost of the employees to be replaced and the cost of the employees that will take their places, not to conclude that a reduction will be effected. The amount to be paid to these employees respectively, is fixed by law. Hence a comparison can be made. This is a constructive piece of legislation which it is competent for the committee to report by virtue of authority given it by Rule XXI under the prescribed conditions. The Chair thinks that it is manifest that this section will effect a retrenchment. The point of order is overruled. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HAY. The Clerk has read the section. I desire to offer an amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment.

Mr. HAY. On page 53, line 14, after the word "clerks," insert the words "civil-service employees."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 14, after the word "clerks," insert the words "civil-service employees."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether that is proper language or not, whether it should be "civil-service employees" or "employees in the classified service."

Mr. HAY. I think it covers the ground.

Mr. MANN. Civil-service employees are all employees who are not in the military service.

Mr. HAY. However, if there is any doubt about it I will change it so as to make it read "employees in the classified service." I am willing to do that if the gentleman thinks that is more certain.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to withdraw his amendment and re-form it in the manner indicated?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be done. The gentleman will present his amendment as he desires to re-form it.

Mr. HAY. After the word "clerks" insert the words "employees in the classified service."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 14, after the word "clerks," insert the words "employees in the classified service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in order to make this section conform to the amendment which was made in regard to the change in the name of the corps, on page 53, line 7, strike out the word "supply" and insert the word "quartermaster," so that it will read "quartermaster corps."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 7, strike out the word "supply" and insert in lieu thereof the word "quartermaster."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. On the same page, line 19, strike out the word "supply" and insert the word "quartermaster."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Virginia if he will suggest all those amendments in the proper place, the Chair will put them en bloc.

Mr. HAY. Then:

In line 19, page 53, strike out the word "supply" and insert the word "quartermaster."

Line 24, page 53, strike out the word "supply" and insert the word "quartermaster."

Page 54, line 1, strike out the word "supply" and insert the word "quartermaster."

Page 54, line 20, strike out the word "service" and insert the word "quartermaster."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all the amendments indicated by him may be voted upon as a whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the office establishments of The Adjutant General, the Inspector General, and the Chief of Staff of the Army are hereby consolidated, and shall hereafter constitute a single bureau of the War Department, which shall be known as the Bureau of the General Staff, and of which the Chief of Staff shall be the head. The Adjutant General's and Inspector General's Departments of the Army are hereby consolidated and merged into the General Staff Corps. The officers of said departments shall hereafter be known as officers of said corps and by the titles of the rank held by them therein, and, except as herein-after specifically provided to the contrary, so far as the officers hereby transferred to the General Staff Corps, and the offices held by them, may be affected, the provisions of sections 26 and 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," are hereby extended so as to apply to the General Staff Corps in the manner and to the extent to which they now apply to The Adjutant General's and the Inspector General's Departments; but nothing in said sections shall be held to apply to any officers of the General Staff Corps except the officers transferred to that corps from The Adjutant General's and Inspector General's Departments by the terms of this act, and nothing in said sections or in this act shall be held or construed so as to nullify or change any of the provisions of existing law as to the detail of officers for duty as Chief of Staff, or as to the period for which officers so detailed may serve, "and no officer who shall have served four years as Chief of Staff shall, except in case of emergency or in time of war, be eligible for further service as Chief of Staff until after he shall have served for at least two years with the line of the Army or on such other duty not pertaining to the General Staff Corps as the President may direct." The officers now holding commissions as officers of the said departments shall hereafter have the same tenure of commission in the General Staff Corps, and as officers of said corps shall have rank of the same grades and dates as that now held by them, and, for the purpose of filling vacancies among them, shall constitute one list, on which they shall be arranged according to rank. So long as any officers shall remain on said list any vacancy occurring therein shall be filled, if possible, from among such officers, by selection if the vacancy occurs in a grade above that of colonel, and, if the vacancy occurs in a grade not above that of colonel, by the promotion of an officer who would have been entitled to promotion to that particular vacancy if the consolidation of departments hereby prescribed had never occurred: Provided, That, except as otherwise specifically provided in this act, after the consolidation of bureaus, departments, and corps hereinbefore provided for shall have been effected, no details to fill vacancies in the grade of colonel in the General Staff Corps shall be made until the number of officers of that grade in said corps shall have been reduced by 3, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade in said corps shall not exceed 10; and no details to fill vacancies in the grade of lieutenant colonel in the General Staff Corps shall be made until after the number of officers of that grade in said corps shall have been reduced by 4, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade in said corps shall not exceed 14; and no details to fill vacancies in the grade of major in the General Staff Corps shall be made until after the number of officers of that grade in said corps shall have been reduced by 7, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade in said corps shall not exceed 25; and no details to fill vacancies in the grade of captain in the General Staff Corps shall be made until after the number of officers of that grade in said corps shall have been reduced by 11, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade in said corps shall not exceed 10; and whenever the separation of a line officer of any grade and arm from the General Staff Corps shall create therein a vacancy that, under the terms of this proviso, can not be filled by detail such separation shall operate to make a permanent reduction of one in the total number of officers of said grade and arm in the line of the Army as soon as such reduction can be made without depriving any officer of his commission: Provided further, That such duty or duties as are now required by law to be performed by any officer or officers of The Adjutant General's or Inspector General's Department shall hereafter be performed by such officer or officers of the General Staff Corps as the Secretary of War may designate for the purpose: Provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of major general shall occur among the officers hereby transferred to the General Staff Corps that vacancy shall not be filled, but the office in which the vacancy occurs shall immediately cease and determine: Provided further, That officers now holding commissions as officers of either of the departments hereby consolidated with the General Staff Corps may at any time, in the discretion of the President, and shall, whenever they shall have served four years as members of said corps, be detached therefrom and assigned to duty with the line of the Army, or to such other duty not pertaining to the General Staff Corps as the President may direct, and they shall not be returned to duty in said corps until they shall have served for two years under detachment therefrom except in cases of emergency or in time of war, and during their detachment from said corps their places therein may be filled by the selection and detail, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, of line officers having the same rank, respectively, as the officers whose places said line officers are to fill: Provided further, That officers of the line of the Army who are now, or who shall hereafter be, detailed for service in any staff corps or department under the provisions of section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," may at any time, in the discretion of the President, be relieved from such service and returned to duty with the line: Provided further, That, in order to expedite the reduction of the number of officers of the consolidated General Staff Corps to the limit contemplated by this act, officers who now hold commissions as officers of either of the departments hereby consolidated with the General Staff Corps, and who are eligible for retirement from active service under any law existing at the date of the approval of this act, shall, upon their own applications, and may, in the discretion of the President, be retired from active service: Provided further, That all officers of the line of the Army now detailed for service in either of the departments hereby consolidated with the General Staff Corps shall be relieved from duty in said corps at the expiration of their present periods of detail, or sooner if the President shall so direct, and all officers hereafter detailed for service in said corps shall be relieved therefrom at the expiration of four years of such service, or sooner if the President shall so direct, and no officer who shall have served for four years under detail in said corps shall be eligible for further service therein until after he shall have served at least two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in case of emergency or in time of war: Provided further, That hereafter, when any officer shall, under the provisions of section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," be appointed or reappointed to an office with rank above that of colonel his appointment to said office and his acceptance of the appointment shall not create a vacancy in the arm, corps, or department from which he shall be appointed, but he shall retain therein the same relative position that he would have held if he had not been appointed to said office, and he shall return to said relative position upon the expiration of his appointment to said office unless he shall be reappointed thereto.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 57, lines 12 to 17, beginning at the last word on line 12, I move to strike out the last word on line 12 and all of lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, and half of line 17, ending with the word "ten."

Mr. MANN. That does not make sense.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 57, line 12, strike out the word "and" at the end of the line and all of lines 13, 14, 15, 16, and half of line 17, down to and including the word "ten."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is very important not to reduce materially the number of live, wide-awake young captains on the General Staff. It is true this makes a reduction of a number of the higher grades in the General Staff, and I am not at all convinced that such reduction is wise; but in regard to the reduction in captains, it seems to me that it is particularly unwise and unfortunate. These young captains, coming in from close contact with the troops, are more vitally in touch with the Army than anyone else. It seems to me we ought to have the full quota of these captains on the General Staff, and that it is unfortunate to reduce them by 11. I hope that this amendment will prevail, striking out the provision which reduces the General Staff by 11 captains.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the act creating the General Staff Corps was passed by Congress in 1903, I believe. The reason given for the passage of that act was that it was very important to have officers who could come here and study questions of defense and problems with regard to war, and to submit the results of their studies to the President and the Secretary of War in order that they might take the necessary steps to carry them out. Now, it does not seem to me that the young captains are the men to study problems of that sort, but rather that those studies should be conducted by men of larger experience than young captains, and therefore we have reduced the number of captains, although only doing so in proportion to the other reductions which we have made in other grades in the Staff Corps. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on page 55, line 24, extending over to line 5 on page 56, there are some quotation marks. I ask that those quotation marks be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 7. That hereafter no vacancies occurring in the grade of major general in the line of the Army shall be filled until the number of officers of that grade shall have been reduced by 3, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade shall not exceed 4; that hereafter no vacancies occurring in the grade of brigadier general in the line of the Army shall be filled until after the number of officers of that grade shall have been reduced by 5, and thereafter the number of officers of said grade shall not exceed 11; and for the purposes of this act general officers not commissioned as officers of any of the staff corps or departments of the Army shall be regarded as general officers of the line: Provided, That hereafter the number of officers above the grade of colonel who shall be members of the General Staff Corps under the provisions of section 3 of the act of Congress approved February 14, 1903, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Army," shall be 2; Provided further, That hereafter service as a cadet of the United States Military Academy or as a naval cadet or midshipman shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer of the Army.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kansas wants to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. My amendment should be inserted at the end of line 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 61, at the end of line 12, insert the following: "Provided further, That hereafter service as a cadet, naval cadet, or midshipman at either the United States Military or Naval Academy, exclusive of the sea service as prescribed by law on the completion of the academic course and preliminary to final graduation at the latter institution, shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer of the Army."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment in order to give the naval cadet the benefit of the two years' service which he has at sea, so that it may be included in computing the length of service.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if his amendment makes any change in the cadet service at West Point?

Mr. HAY. No; only the two years of sea service of cadets at the Naval Academy. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if it is his understanding that this proviso is retroactive in the sense of affecting the pay and voluntary retirement period of officers now in the service, or if it is meant simply to apply to those who may hereafter come into the service?

Mr. HAY. Do I understand the gentleman's question to refer to a man who, for instance, has served 30 years and wants to make application for retirement?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not only that case, but all officers who are in the Army. For instance, a man may have served 20 years, counting service in the Military Academy. Would this make it four years longer before he would be entitled to an increase of pay by reason of length of service?

Mr. HAY. It would.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman, further, whether he considers that it is proper to change what has been an established condition for thirty-odd years? I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea that as an original proposition service in the academy should not be considered as service in the Army for the purpose of increasing pay as the result of length of service; but it strikes me as questionable to undertake retroactively to affect the status of the men now in the service, and that is practically what you are doing.

Mr. HAY. I do not think it can be said that I am doing it retroactively. I am simply applying what the gentleman acknowledges to be a good principle to men who have not earned their increase because they were in school four years of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. They have earned this increase of pay by virtue of four years at the Military Academy, and they are enjoying it by virtue of that service; and while it is true that that has been the case since 1884, yet I do not think we are doing any injustice by now requiring them to serve the additional four years in order to obtain their increase of pay for length of service. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under the present rule a man only has to serve 26 years in the Army before he may apply to be retired at the end of 30 years, counting the 4 years of service at the Military Academy as a part of his Army service. Of course, it is discretionary with the President whether he will retire the man at the end of that time.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I thoroughly agree that as an original proposition it is not sound to count as service four years' attendance at a school maintained by the Federal Government; but the point I am trying to impress upon the chairman of the committee is this, that, whether wise or not, that was a means whereby the status of these men was fixed, and their pay rested upon that status. Now, it does not seem to me altogether equitable to undertake to change that status. For instance, I know of some cases where men have looked forward to voluntarily retiring. They may or may not take advantage of that provision of the law. But they have gone along for thirty-odd years on the supposition that at a given date they would have the right to retire.

Mr. HAY. At the end of 40 years' service.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. Now, you are proposing by this legislation to postpone their right, which has been a fixed right for thirty-odd years, four years longer; and while I think the principle is sound as to the future, I am not prepared to say that I think it ought to be applied to existing conditions.

Mr. HAY. Does not the gentleman think it is right that they should serve the full 40 years? The very idea of retired pay is that the officer, being given the right to retire, should serve at least 40 years in order to obtain that right.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that may be true, but the proposition that confronts us here is not what time should be fixed, but here is a method of computing the time upon which the status of everybody has rested for the past 30-odd years, and while that basis seems an illogical one and ought not to apply in the future, it does not seem altogether equitable to change it now.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. I will yield for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Kentucky to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRINCE. If I understand the contention of the gentleman from Kentucky, it is that it is questionable whether we ought to take from these men that which they believed when they entered the service they had a right to receive?

Mr. SHERLEY. In my judgment, the original basis for computing the longevity pay is an illogical one, but it has been the basis for 30-odd years or more. It does not seem to me altogether advisable to undertake to change that situation as to these people.

Mr. PRINCE. I get the gentleman's idea. Now, let me ask the gentleman if he did not vote in favor of taking away from the officers and enlisted men who served in the Tropics 10 and 20 per cent additional pay?

Mr. SHERLEY. I answer the gentleman "no," because I did not vote. In the second place, I would suggest to the gentleman that in a spirit of fairness it would be better to discuss this particular amendment and not another amendment not now before the House.

Mr. PRINCE. The point is the same from my standpoint, because it was a part of the compensation that they were to receive when they entered the service; that is, pay for foreign service when they were performing duties in foreign countries. I did not ask the question with a view of entrapping the gentleman or putting him at a disadvantage, but I asked it in good faith.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, while the Committee on Military Affairs has radically differed over some of the legislative provisions of this bill, yet we all recognize the fairness of the chairman of the Military Committee in acceding to some changes where it has been pointed out that they are clearly inequitable.

Now, this section that we are now on, this proviso, taking away from officers of the Army credit for cadet service at West Point, is one clearly unfair to a large class of officers now in the service, as pointed out by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Length of service pay is computed every 5 years, and officers who serve so long get a percentage of increase. An officer who has served 20 years receives the maximum pay. This bill does not affect those men, but the younger officers who have served only 10 or 15 years will be cut off and deprived of that 4 years of service at the Military Academy which their brother officers enjoy. Let me call the committee's attention to the fact that a cadet, when he goes into either of the academies—the Military Academy or the Naval Academy—takes an oath of service to the Government practically the same as an enlisted man does or a commissioned officer. The service to the Government is just as arduous as that given by men in the ranks or by the commissioned officers who receive their commission from civil life.

Another point. An officer of the Army from civil life who does not know an iota in regard to the military duties that he is called upon to perform, must serve 3 or 4 years before he becomes a competent officer. He is in a school of instruction for the first few years, and yet you pay him $1,700 a year as a second lieutenant from the time he takes the oath of office. The cadet goes into West Point and works much harder to get a military education, and he gets only $600 a year. I say it is unfair to take a man into the Army from civil life and give him maximum pay and deprive the cadet of credit for his 4 years' service at the same time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Some men go into the service who have attended various military schools throughout the country—graduates of those schools. They go to the schools at their own expense and get more or less of their military training at their own expense. Does the gentleman think it quite fair to pay these men when they go into the Army as second lieutenants a lower salary than those men who are educated at the expense of the Government?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are paid a higher salary.

Mr. MANN. No; at the end of the year after the cadets have been in the service they get 10 per cent added to their pay, while at the end of the year the man who educated himself will still draw the original pay.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I take the position that the man who goes into the Army from civil life is not as fully educated as an officer until after three or four years of service. He does not compare with the man who graduates from West Point in point of efficiency or value to the Government. Then there is another point. Take an officer who receives a commission from the ranks of the Army. He is given credit for his service as a private soldier in computing the length of time of his entire service. That is not taken from him.

Mr. HAY. No; because he serves in the ranks of the Army, and he has rendered hard service.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if service at West Point does not involve as arduous mental labor, at least?

Mr. HAY. But we are not paying for the education of these soldiers in the Army. They have to educate themselves at odd times, when they are not performing their duties as a soldier, and stand an examination for their commissions.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me call the gentleman's attention to another point. We appoint surgeons in the Army, young men, to the rank of lieutenant. As soon as they receive their commissions they are sent to the Army Medical School to be given a final course of instruction. All of that time they receive the maximum pay for that rank, and that service at the Army Medical School is counted in their length of service.

Mr. HAY. I would be very glad to accept an amendment curing that defect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is entirely just and proper that they should receive it, and I hope the chairman of the committee, with the liberality that he has displayed toward other amendments that had this element of fairness, will concede this point.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] expressed a thought that must have come to the mind of nearly every man who has given this particular paragraph in the bill any consideration. The young men at the Military Academy are peculiarly fortunate. They are educated at Government expense. They are paid a salary higher than that earned by the average workman throughout the country to receive military instruction for the discharge of duty in the Army, to which they are subsequently to be sent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Not only military instruction, but they receive a college education.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Exactly so; and I want to say in that connection that I have long believed that if the Naval and Military Academies were thrown open to all young men in this country, measuring up to certain physical, mental, and moral standards, and they were authorized to go there and to pay toward the expense of maintaining the academy $1,000, or $1,500, or $2,000 a year, those academies would be overwhelmed with applications for admission.

I think that each academy would have from five to ten thousand students, because, as a reward for good service there, as a reward for perseverance to the end of the curriculum, as a reward for graduation above a certain standard of excellence, they would be given commissions in the Army or in the Navy. Thousands and tens of thousands of young men in this country would be willing to expend years of labor and a great deal of money in an effort to procure that very thing. I think these young men in these academies are particularly fortunate, and I do not believe they ought to receive longevity pay for that period during which they are simply being given instruction for the military life at the expense of the taxpayer.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman's idea, if carried out, would give to the people a splendid and well-equipped body of men, coming from these institutions, who would be of use in the way of a reserve. These thousands of young men, if these institutions were thrown open to them, when they graduated would make a splendid reserve. And does the gentleman not think it would be a good thing?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It would unquestionably multiply to a considerable degree the number of young men who had had military instruction.

Mr. PRINCE. And to that extent be to the good of the country when it was in peril.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not so certain always that the development of the military spirit is to the good of the country. I am not entirely convinced of that. I think we have some people who are military mad in this country, who would expend practically every dollar of the revenues of the Government for the development of the Army and the Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. And yet the gentleman thinks there is enough military spirit down there in Texas to enable Texas to whip Mexico without the aid of any other portion of the country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be my belief in that respect, I have never said so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This paragraph is not retroactive in the sense that it is intended to take away from any officer any money that he has received. It is simply intended to deny him and all others the privilege of getting in the future a sum of money based upon service at the Military Academy. I think they are particularly fortunate to have had that advantage given to them upon what is admitted an unsound basis.

Mr. HOBSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he is sure this would not reduce the present pay of any officer?

Mr. SLAYDEN. If he is receiving pay because of his attendance upon school exercises, it should, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two on this. I graduated from the Military Academy in 1894. When I went there I took the oath of office, I took the oath of allegiance and bound myself for eight years to serve the Government of the United States. No recruit enlisting as a private soldier binds himself for eight years. No student in a private school takes the oath of allegiance and binds himself even for a day to the Government. No student in a private school has to go through what a student at the Military Academy or the Naval Academy has to go through. He has his own vacation, lives at his own home, and is in no way connected with the military service, and the work that he has to do is not comparable with that of either academy. There are three ways of getting into the service of the United States as an officer. A man can go through the academy, he can be appointed from civil life, or he can come up from the ranks. Take two men of the same age, young men seeking to serve their country as officers. Say they are the age of 21, if you please, manhood. One is willing to go to the Military Academy and spend four years of his life in getting an education that he may be a better officer, that he may perform the functions for which he is to be educated in a better way than a civilian appointee can. He goes in for the munificent pay—when I was a cadet—of $540 a year. He does not get that pay, he does not get that money, he does not see that money, but he is allowed credit to that amount. For what? For food, for light, for fuel, for clothes, for laundry, for books, for drawing instruments, and articles of that nature. He agrees to serve for eight years. He puts in four of the hardest years of life that is ever put in in this country by anybody. He has one vacation in four years, if he behaves himself and does not get too many demerits, and he might get a demerit for having his hair too long.

Mr. BERGER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. AMES. Yes.

Mr. BERGER. How much does our country pay a man who enlists as a machinist apprentice in a factory to learn the trade for five years, a very useful occupation, although peaceful work? When he goes to war he enters as a private in the front rank, not as an officer. What does the machinist get?

Mr. AMES. He gets more pay than the cadet.

Mr. BERGER. He does not; I beg the gentleman's pardon. A machinist apprentice gets the first year nothing, the second year he gets a dollar per week, and the third year he gets $2, and then $3 and $5 a week, and he is a man who is doing useful work.

Mr. AMES. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BERGER. I know the conditions.

Mr. AMES. I would like to go along with my presentation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. AMES. No enlisted man in the service gets pay in proportion to what is given outside. Now, take these two men of the same age, to revert to my proposition, one goes to the academy for four years to be properly educated; the other man takes an examination for appointment from civil life. Both are the same age, admitting both are equally fitted for the service and equally desirable. The one who takes the examination through a little influence from civil life gets appointed and goes in the service at the pay of a second lieutenant instantly—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AMES. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What qualifications are required of men who go into the Army from civil life?

Mr. AMES. He has to pass a physical examination and a small mental examination.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Any technical examination?

Mr. AMES. I say, a small mental examination.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think my friend wants to do the War Department the injustice of saying they admit men into the Army on a small mental examination.

Mr. AMES. I am very glad to say that the entrance examination into the Army from civil life is not as hard as the entrance examination into West Point.

Mr. HAY. They have to stand an examination in one language, either French or German?

Mr. AMES. Granted. But the examination is not as a whole as hard in entering the Army from civil life as when entering the academy. I tried for the entrance, and I know what I had to do to get through.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The object I had was this: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] disparages this entrance examination, saying that apparently it requires no equipment whatever to go into the Army from civil life. But is not that civilian under much greater handicap to acquire knowledge and information to assist him to pass that examination than the man who has had all the advantages of the training at West Point?

Mr. AMES. Yes; and that is why I say he has not as hard an examination to pass, and that is why an examination which a cadet takes on graduation is harder.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; on graduation. The gentleman spoke about the entrance examination at the Military Academy.

Mr. AMES. Exactly so. I doubt if half of those who go into civil life would succeed in passing the entrance examination to the academy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say this to the gentleman. I have some knowledge of some young men who had served at least three years in the Military Academy, and for one reason or another were compelled to leave the academy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. After spending a year additional in study they had considerable difficulty in passing the examination for a commission, while they had no trouble whatever in passing the entrance examination to the academy.

Mr. BURLESON. Take the case of young men who have graduated at the head of their classes at certain approved military schools in the United States which they had attended at their own expense—

Mr. AMES. Let me finish my own speech, if you please. I am trying to draw a parallel comparison. I will answer the gentleman a little bit later on that proposition, but let me finish my own presentation, please. I was comparing, if I may be allowed to do so—

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask a question so that you can answer it in the course of your speech.

Mr. AMES. I will cover that question, I think.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask my question.

Mr. AMES. Please let me finish my speech in my own way. I am comparing in parallel two of the same eligibility—one who goes into the Army through West Point and one who goes in through civil life. Say that both of them are 21 years of age. One immolates himself for four years in order to be a better officer, with no pay at all—a bare existence. The other man goes into the Army through the civil-life examination and draws pay from the day he takes his oath of office, and he draws full pay for four years, while the boy in the academy is drawing nothing except a mere existence. And yet your proposition here is that the one who makes himself a better officer—the one who has gone through that struggle—should be reduced in his pay 10 per cent.

Now, let us make a further comparison. Two boys go into the academy at the same age, say, 17 or 19. Suppose one fails and can not keep up with the rest. Manifestly he is not as good an officer; manifestly he is not as clever in acquiring his instruction as a military man; and the man who fails goes out in civil life and, passing an examination, becomes an officer. In other words, men were discharged in the first year in the academy and became officers, while I was a second-class man, and yet you would allow such a man full time and cut the graduate of the academy. There you have two men who started together. One falls by the wayside in his service and education, but goes in through civil life and draws full pay, while the other cadet is drawing a bare existence. And yet you would discriminate against the one who goes through the academy.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMES. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BURLESON. I thought the gentleman was going to yield to me.

Mr. AMES. I was making my parallel presentation. After I get through I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PEPPER. The gentleman spoke of the cadet binding himself to serve the Government for eight years?

Mr. AMES. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. Is it not a fact that a great many cadets, on graduating from West Point, resign?

Mr. AMES. Very few.

Mr. PEPPER. They have that opportunity and privilege.

Mr. AMES. They have the privilege when the resignation is accepted, and that rests entirely with the Secretary of War—the privilege that any officer has.

Mr. PEPPER. They are always accepted, are they not?

Mr. AMES. Oh, no; they are not.

Mr. PEPPER. Very few of them are turned down.

Mr. AMES. Very few of them resign. I was the only one in my class, and that was at a time when there were more cadet officers than there were vacancies, and additional lieutenants were made and a great many additional lieutenantcies were carried in the Army at that time so as to provide positions for graduates from the academy.

Now, let us go a bit further. Suppose two men try to enter the service. One goes from West Point, or say both go to West Point and one is dismissed in his first year and goes into the Army as an enlisted man and serves as an enlisted man for three years and passes his examination from the ranks—a thing which is often done. His service for three years as an enlisted man, under this proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs—his three years of enlisted service—would count toward his 10 per cent increase, while the four years of his former comrade, the cadet who remained at the academy, would not count. Do you consider that fair or equitable? From any point of view that you look at this proposition I can not see why service at the academy should not be considered as much service in the Army of the United States as when you are an enlisted man, going in from the ranks or going in from civil life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay the committee long, but for fear that my position may be misunderstood, particularly after what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I want to say that as an original proposition it strikes me as almost absurd to count the four years spent at West Point as service in the Army. I only spoke of it because, as a matter of fixed status, it seemed to me there might be some equity in permitting it to remain as to the men now in the service. I have had my own patience tested at times to the limit by the attitude of boys at West Point. I think the boy that gets a chance to go to West Point is an exceedingly lucky boy. [Applause.] I think the boy that goes to West Point for four years at Government expense has not any claim against the Government, but has a very great obligation to the Government [applause], an obligation that to my mind ought to entail upon him life service, unless there is some very strong reason for his leaving the service; so much so that in the case of a boy whom I appointed to Annapolis—and in every instance I have made the boy say to me that he expected to stay for life in the service when he got out of the academy—I expressed in very plain language my feeling as to his action, because I know of hundreds of boys who would be glad to have the opportunity to qualify for service to their country. It has never occurred to me that there is any special claim that a West Pointer has, neither am I willing to admit that the West Point graduate is always the superior officer, although he ought to be, because he has had at Government expense four years of the best opportunity to qualify. But there are in the service of the United States Army to-day any number of men from civil life who are the equals in ability and equals in standing with men who came out of West Point.

Mr. AMES. The gentleman does not contend that because the soldier's education was had at the expense of the Government for four years it would make him a better officer. It is because he has the military education that makes him the better officer, however he gets it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but I think that when he gets it at Government expense he incurs a liability to the Government [applause], and the Government has not incurred a liability to him, which seems to be the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. AMES. The point I desire to make is that the bill as drawn by the majority of the committee will result in reducing the pay of the most efficient class of officers in the Army and Navy of the United States, and, to my mind, without reason, logic, or fairness.

Mr. HAY. I move to close debate on this paragraph.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask for three minutes.

Mr. HAY. I move that debate on this paragraph close in 20 minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I should like five minutes.

Mr. HAY. Then, I move to close debate in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that debate on this paragraph close at the end of 25 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will take but three minutes of this limited time to clear up the question of the status of cadets and midshipmen.

The gentleman will recall that in the time of the Spanish War midshipmen were ordered from Annapolis to the front. Some of those midshipmen lost their lives. Gentlemen who will go further back will remember that from 1861 to 1865 midshipmen—and the parallel holds at West Point—were continually ordered from instruction to the front. I want the Members to realize, when they come to vote on the proposition, that these midshipmen and cadets are to all purposes officers, are subject to orders, and receive orders to perform service as officers, and as such not only are they liable to be ordered to the front, but whenever the occasion arises are actually sent to the front in time of war.

I wish further to bear out the statement of the gentleman from West Virginia, that while it is always a privilege to have one's activities in operation for the purpose of developing oneself, still those activities represent service. I believe if you will ask officers who have gone through West Point and officers who have gone through Annapolis, when the time comes for them to retire at the close of their career, what period of their career was most arduous as a term of duty, that they would all say the hardest service they rendered was not in the field but at Annapolis or West Point, as the case may be.

Mr. AMES. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry? Is it not the broader and more statesmanlike point of view to consider that an officer educated at either academy, who resigns and goes into civil life if there is no vacancy, or sometimes when there are vacancies, and who enters the militia of a State, oftentimes renders greater service to the military establishment than if he remained in the Army? And is not the assistance he can render in the military education of members of the militia often more advantageous to the country than if he had continued in the Army?

Mr. HOBSON. I agree with the gentleman that it is a very valuable thing to have graduates from Annapolis and West Point go out to take such positions, and the Government has not lost its investment when they do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the proposition before the House, as I understand it, is that young gentlemen who are fortunate above all of their fellows in being selected to receive a military education at the cost of the Government shall receive in addition to that military education and their keep while they are receiving it longevity pay based upon the four years during which they are being educated as though they were actually in active service during those four years, and on the field of battle, if necessary. It seems to me the mere statement of the question ought to decide it in the mind of any fair-minded person. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has so well stated the whole matter that I am rather disinclined to trespass upon the time of the House for further discussion of it. The young men who enter West Point and Annapolis are exceedingly fortunate to have that opportunity. The Government educates them and secures for them an opportunity to follow the military profession for life. Curiously enough, the argument is made that these gentlemen ought to receive this longevity pay in order to equalize them with the young gentlemen who come into the Army from civil life. Let us remember, in the first place, that those who enter the Army from civil life do so after having secured their education at their own expense, and further than that, on an average they are 3 or 4 years older—possibly 5 years older, on an average—when they enter the service than are the cadets when they enter the Military Academy. So if this provision becomes a law, they will enter upon actual service on an equality with regard to pay with the men educated in the academy, and they should. As matters now stand the soldier from civil life has a handicap of about 4 years, on the average, in the matter of pay.

There is another side to it. We pay the officers in our Army more than officers are paid in any army in the world. The pay is much higher than that of any other government in the world. I do not say it is too high, but I do say it is surely high enough. There is no class of American citizens of equal capacity who are so certain of as large a return through life and of a competency in their old age as are officers in the military establishment of the United States.

I have been of the opinion that we do not pay our enlisted men enough, certainly not until the recent raise in pay. We have always paid officers well, always cared for them well, and it seems to me that they are asking a great deal when they ask not only that they shall be educated at Government expense, but that the four years during which the Government is educating them and providing for them shall be reckoned in their longevity pay.

Mr. Sisson. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. Sisson. Does the gentleman know what it costs to educate a cadet at the Military Academy?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know accurately.

Mr. Sisson. My information is that it costs $4,500 a year at the Naval Academy, but I have no information of what it costs at the Military Academy. I presume it is about the same amount—$18,000 for the four years.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; close to $20,000 when you add in the interest on the property and the pay of the officers who instruct them.

Mr. Sisson. I quite agree with the gentleman from Wyoming, and I only interrupted him for the purpose of showing to the committee what the Government does for the boys.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for the information, because it emphasizes the argument that I was attempting to make, that the Government does a great deal for these young men, that they are very fortunate indeed to be selected from among their fellows to be given an opportunity to secure at Government expense the best all-around education in the world.

I do not believe that the young men themselves, if it were left to them, would expect to have these years during which they are preparing for the military service credited to them in increasing their pay as though they were years of actual service in the Army. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up the time of the committee at this time, because I did not intend to speak on this subject. If I can be assured of five minutes after the next paragraph has been read I will be satisfied.

Mr. HAY. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time the minority will offer a motion which will come before the House to strike out of the bill that portion which proposes to cut off the 20 per cent increase of pay to the enlisted men while serving abroad. I have never believed that the enlisted men received too much pay from the Government. I have helped to increase that pay since I have been in the House, and I hope that the enlisted men, who receive very small pay at the best, will not have their pay stricken down by this House.

But I never could see any excuse for counting the time at the Military Academy in computing longevity pay for the officers, either of the Army or of the Navy. I think that they ought to be placed on an equal plane with the officers coming in from other military academies in the country where they have paid for their own education, and that we ought not to give preference in pay to the officers simply because they have been fortunate enough to be educated at the expense of the National Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, a few years ago the pay of the officers and enlisted men was largely increased. In some of these publications here there is a complete table of that pay, but I am unable at this moment to put my hand on it. The chairman says that it was increased from 25 to 40 per cent for the pay of enlisted men, and bonuses for reenlistment.

It was argued before the committee, when the plea was made for increased pay, that it would do away with the necessity for additional pay for foreign service.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, why was not it done away with in the same bill?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can only say that I was not responsible for making the bill, and I am told that it was put on in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. The increase in pay was there when the other became a law.

Mr. HAY. The increase of pay was; and the argument used was that if the pay was increased this pay could be dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Well, why was it not dispensed with?

Mr. HAY. The increase of pay was put on as an amendment to the Army bill when it was in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. But the other matter was in order in conference on the same point.

Mr. HAY. I do not know about that. I only know that the officers of the Army who were advocating the increase of pay made that statement.

Mr. MANN. It plainly was not the intention of Congress at the time, because it was entirely within the province of Congress to do both at once, if it so desired.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman knows as well as I do how legislation is enacted here in conference reports at the end of a session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the intention of Congress as to legislation has not always been shown in the agreements made on appropriation bills during the last 16 years.

Mr. MANN. Where a question is plainly before the committee, and people agree to it, as stated here, there is no reason why that agreement should not be carried out. I took part in the movement to increase the pay of enlisted men, and I never heard of the proposition that that involved a decrease of the foreign-service pay.

Mr. KAHN. My recollection is that the pay of the enlisted men was increased by the House and the pay of the officers by the Senate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I presume my five minutes are about exhausted, but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that on page 90 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on the legislative features of this bill there is to be found a complete table of the pay of enlisted men prior to the act of May 11, 1908, and following that, on pages 93 and 94, there is an accurate list of the pay that they now receive. If the gentleman will only look at that he will see that there was a very material increase of pay at that time.

Mr. MANN. And there has been a very material increase in the matériel of the enlisted man since that increase was made.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say that a serious effort has been made to get rid of that matériel and substitute new matériel every two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an independent section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section to be inserted after section 7, as follows:

"Sec. 8. That the appropriations herein provided for for the several departments consolidated under this act shall be available for the consolidated corps herein created."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I think that explains itself.

Mr. BARTHOLOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before this bill is reported to the House I should like to briefly refer to an important matter and request the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee. I am aware that there is nothing contained in this bill in reference to the Army canteen, and I am also aware that it would be useless for me to offer an amendment, for the reason that such an amendment would be a change of existing law and would, therefore, be out of order.

A few weeks ago I had the honor to present to this House a petition signed by 278 medical men of the United States, many of them high medical authorities, in favor of the restoration of the Army canteen. They based their demand upon the question not only of temperance, but also of the good morals and the health and lives of the soldiers. They show in this petition, Mr. Chairman, that there are certain diseases prevalent in the American Army, mainly as a result of the abolition of the canteen, because these diseases, since the canteen has been abolished, have increased more than 100 per cent. A condition is presented that is almost alarming. In the British Army the percentage of such diseases is 7.6 per cent. In the Austro-Hungarian Army, 5.4 per cent; in the French Army, 3.5 per cent; in the Prussian Army, 1.9 per cent; in the Bavarian Army, 1.5 per cent; and in the American Army these diseases prevail to the alarming extent of 19.7 per cent. In other words, out of every five soldiers one is suffering from that unmentionable disease, and it is for this reason that these medical men appeal to Congress to restore the canteen so that the men may be enabled to remain in the barracks and posts and spend their leisure hours there under proper surveillance of the officers instead of being driven out into the dives surrounding these posts where rotgut whisky and lewd women abound, and where their minds and health are being poisoned.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have only five minutes. If the gentleman will get my time extended I would be very glad to yield.

I also had the honor to present a petition signed by 2,386 Army women. The mothers, the wives, the sisters, the daughters of the American soldiers appeal to Congress to save their sons, their fathers, and their brothers from these terrible conditions. These petitions, Mr. Chairman, contain the original signatures, as I have stated, of 2,386 women whose husbands, brothers, or sons are now in the American Army.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If I can have an extension of time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes additional time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that probably one man in five in the American Army is diseased?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman believe that that is due largely to the abolition of the canteen?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Well, it has been shown that the increase of those diseases is more than 100 per cent since the canteen has been abolished, and I refer in this connection to the official report of the Surgeon General of the United States Army. I notice that some of the temperance organizations of this country are now sending out a statement prepared by Col. Maus, of the Army, in which he tries to show the contrary, but the Surgeon General has taken it upon himself to refute the statements of Col. Maus and shows that the increase of those diseases is over 100 per cent since the Army canteen has been abolished. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand some more petitions on this subject. They are from a large number of camps of the Spanish War Veterans, who are also pleading for the restoration of the canteen. They are from men who have had experience in this matter and who want to be protected against the evils which surround the Army posts and ask for an arrangement which will keep the men inside of the reservations and posts. A few weeks ago, Mr. Chairman, a meeting took place of American women at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York City, and if I can have the privilege I would like to insert in the RECORD the proceedings of that meeting and the speeches delivered there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the papers indicated by him may be made a part of his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. While I have some time left I wish to read here a paragraph or two from the address delivered by Mrs. Burbank, the wife of Gen. James B. Burbank, United States Army. She said:

I want to present to you the subject of the canteen from the Army woman's standpoint. Ten years have passed since the abolition of the canteen, and ample opportunity has been given to study the evil effects of the law and to provide grounds for the return of the conditions which were beneficial to the health and morals of the service.

Year after year since the law went into effect the Surgeon General of the Army has reported the injurious effects on the health of the soldiers. Every general who has commanded the Army has urged the restoration of the canteen. The press throughout the country has met the issue fairly and squarely, and to-day public sentiment demands a reversal of the act of February 2, 1901, which prohibits the sale of beer and light wines on military reservations.

The women of the Army have presented the following petition to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

Now comes the language of that petition, and I might as well read it, as it is very interesting:

Having seen and felt the effects of the act of February 2, 1901, prohibiting the sale on military reservations of beer and light wines; realizing from an experience extending over 10 years that the effect of that act has been injurious to discipline, harmful to morality, and conducive to intemperance, having deeply at heart the truest interests of the Army, and therefore the Nation, believing that from our close relation and intimate association with our soldiers we are better judges of the effects on them of such legislation than those who look in from without or who act upon mere theory or generalization, we, the mothers, daughters, sisters, and wives of officers and enlisted men, do respectfully urge and earnestly request, in the interest of discipline, morality, and temperance, the repeal of the said act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

The papers referred to are as follows:

NATIONAL LEAGUE FOR THE CIVIC EDUCATION OF WOMEN,
WALDORF-ASTORIA, January 16, 1912.

A report of the proceedings at a meeting of the National League for the Civic Education of Women, held at the Astor Gallery, Waldorf-Astoria, New York, January 16, 1912, at 4 p. m.

The meeting was called to order by Mrs. Gilbert E. Jones, who, after announcing the subjects of the next lectures to be given under the auspices of the league, introduced Rev. Thomas R. Silcer as presiding officer.

Dr. Silcer assumed the office with some appropriate remarks, and introduced Mrs. James B. Burbank, wife of Gen. James B. Burbank, United States Army.

Mrs. BURBANK. I want to present to you the subject of the canteen from the Army woman's standpoint. Ten years have passed since the abolition of the canteen and ample opportunity has been given to study the evil effects of the law and to provide grounds for the return to conditions which were beneficial to the health and morals of the service.

Year after year since the law went into effect the Surgeon General of the Army has reported the injurious effects on the health of the soldiers. Every general who has commanded the Army has urged the restoration of the canteen. The press throughout the country has met the issue fairly and squarely, and to-day public sentiment demands a reversal of the act of February 2, 1901, which prohibits the sale of beer and light wines on military reservations.

The women of the Army have presented the following petition to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

"Having seen and felt the effects of the act of February 2, 1901, prohibiting the sale on military reservations of beer and light wines; realizing from an experience extending over 10 years that the effect of that act has been injurious to discipline, harmful morally, and conducive to intemperance, having deeply at heart the truest interests of the Army, and therefore the Nation, believing that from our close relation and intimate association with our soldiers, we are better judges of the effects on them of such legislation than those who look in from without or who act upon mere theory or generalization, we, the mothers, daughters, sisters, and wives of officers and enlisted men, do respectfully urge and earnestly request, in the interest of discipline, morality, and temperance, the repeal of the said act."

This petition has been signed by 2,400 women connected with the Army. Among the signers are Mrs. Henry L. Stimson, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. Leonard Wood, wife of the Chief of Staff; Mrs. Frederick Dent Grant, wife of the general commanding the Division of the Atlantic; Mrs. Arthur Murray, wife of the general commanding the Western Division; Mrs. Thomas H. Barry, wife of the commandant of the West Point Military Academy; and other well-known Army women, as well as the relatives of enlisted men in the Philippines, Alaska, Hawaii, and throughout the United States.

If I am not mistaken, it is the first time in the history of the United States that the women of the Army have appealed to Congress on any public question. It is with courage born of knowledge that they now appeal to our patriotic citizens to uphold their contention. As mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters of United States soldiers we are entitled to a hearing.

There are perils greater than those of the fire and sword, and these are the perils with which the women of the Army are surrounded to-day. The question has often been asked, Why should women take the initiative in this matter of the restoration of the canteen? The reason is that the officers of the Army are forbidden by law to endeavor to influence legislation, and the present question involves a change of the law. About a year ago we read a dispatch from San Antonio, Tex., which said that "the most amusing feature of the coming of the troops to San Antonio is the wild rush of saloons and dive keepers to get reservations near the Army posts. Prices for which property could formerly be bought are now charged for rentals."

There is a side of the question under discussion from which women shrink with repugnance, but it is one which must be met in this conflict, where the bodies and souls of men are at stake. The Surgeon General of the Army has said that there is a peril which has come to our men which neither our national optimism nor the Anglo-Saxon disposition to ignore a subject which is offensive to public prudery can longer excuse a frank and honest confrontation of the problem. We claim the right, which has never been denied to women, the right to safeguard the family and the home. We have stood aside for years while other women have dictated a policy which has ruined thousands of men. We contend that the settlement of this question, which concerns the internal economy of the service, should be delegated to the military authorities, with the recognition that the men who were competent to bring order out of chaos in the Philippines, who have stamped out the yellow fever in Cuba, and who have made typhoid no longer a menace on the Panama Canal are competent to decide whether the soldier should have the privilege of drinking a glass of beer under proper military supervision. [Applause.]

Dr. Silcer then introduced Mrs. Charles F. Roe, wife of Gen. Charles F. Roe, of the National Guard of the State of New York.

Mrs. ROE. There is so much to be said, ladies and gentlemen and Mr. President, that I am going to confine myself to a very short paper. In speaking for the canteen, so called, I believe that the most important thing to consider is the fact that we are dealing with men, who, as soldiers serving their country, are none the less citizens. Prohibition has never accomplished anything. We can not make people moral by law; we can only control excesses. [Applause.] Why should a soldier be deprived of all rights of a man because he is a soldier? If a judge or a banker or a shopkeeper wants a drink, he goes and pays for it. Why should not a soldier have the same privilege? This money spent at the canteen returns in direct benefits to the enlisted men in luxuries for the mess table and many other ways in the garrison. I believe the reestablishment of the canteen means a new and better order of things for the Army. In my experience of 15 years I found the men self-respecting and, with respect to opportunity, the equals of any equal number of citizens. [Applause.] In the early eighties I took a trip from Fort Custer to Fort — under the escort of a sergeant and six men, a distance of 400 miles, camping at night and making about 25 miles a day. We constantly passed saloons and ranches where the vilest liquor could be bought, and not a man fell by the way, and they did not even go out to get a drink. The same escort took me back to Fort Custer with the same care and protection, and I was treated as tenderly and delicately as if my husband had been in the party.

I earnestly advocate the restoration of what, for want of a better name, I think should be called the Enlisted Men's Club and Exchange. [Applause.]

Dr. Slicer then introduced Maj. Louis Livingston Seaman.

Maj. SEAMAN. Mr. Chairman and friends of the American soldier, you have heard this message, and it seems to me that an additional syllable would be a superfluity. If the appeal of these ladies, backed, as it is, by the 2,400 names of the wives and sisters and daughters of officers of the Army and enlisted men of the Army, is not sufficient, these women who in foreign posts or in home garrisons are often called upon to face dangers of which the civilian has no conception—I say, if the appeal of these ladies has not convinced you all of the iniquity of this outrageous law, then nothing else will, for the women—the women of the Army and the women of the country—are, in the ultimate analysis, the greatest sufferers from it.

It is therefore peculiarly fitting that this League for the Civic Education of Women should consider this problem, which has come to be one of not only national but of vital importance.

I have been requested to present some of its salient features, from a medical standpoint, as a reason for demanding its repeal, for it is time we educated our emotions to the terms of reason, especially when we see how a wave of sentimentality, such as was brought to bear on Congress by the well-meaning but misguided Woman's Christian Temperance Union, could be crystallized into what has proved a most pernicious law.

It has been said that virtue is more dangerous than vice, because its excesses are not subject to the restraint of conscience, and it seems to me that in this instance they have pretty well proved it so. Now, what was the practical effect of preventing the soldier from obtaining a glass of beer in his well-regulated canteen on the Government reservation? That, in a nutshell, is what that law amounts to. Listen to the testimony of a few witnesses, masters of military administration, whom it may be supposed are quite as familiar with the needs of the Army and have its welfare quite as deeply at heart and who are quite as well qualified to govern it as these dear ladies of the Temperance Union. The present commanding officer of the Army, Gen. Leonard Wood, himself a physician of prominence, says:

"The effect of the abolition of the canteen has been almost unqualifiedly bad."

Gen. Corbin, who commanded the Army in 1902, says:

"It would seem unnecessary to argue to a fair-minded person the superiority of a system which provides a mild alcoholic beverage at reasonable cost in moderate quantities, under strict military control, to one which results in luring the soldier away from his barracks to neighboring dives where his body and soul are poisoned by vile liquors, with the accompanying vice of harlotry, and where his money is taken from him by gamblers and thieves."

In 1903 Gen. Young, then in command of the Army, says:

"Reports received from officers of all grades * * * exhibit practical unanimity of opinion as to the evil effects of this restriction (the law under discussion), * * * in increased drunkenness; in loathsome diseases contracted by men while under the influence of a bad or drugged liquor; in increased desertions from drunkenness from the same causes; the men while in a drugged condition being robbed by their brazen associates of both sexes, and for this reason reluctant to return to their posts."

In 1904 Gen. Chaffee, than whom no more sane, conservative, and experienced officer ever drew sword, rising as he did through merit from the ranks to the position of commander in chief of the Army, states in his report:

"These desertions can be in large part attributed to the malign influence of saloons and brothels situated near the reservations, seducing enlisted men from the paths of decency. The canteen provided places of amusement and social intercourse, where men could get light refreshments under restraining, decent, and orderly influences. If men are unable to get a glass of beer in a decent and orderly manner in the garrison they will resort to the vile brothels which cluster around the borders of the reservations, where they drink all manner of alcoholic beverages and often sink into debauchery and ruin. With the beginning of the work on the addition to the post of Fort Sam Houston it is observed that the prices of business property immediately in the rear of the new reservation have materially advanced and that arrangements are already being made for the construction of the usual assortment of saloons and dives that the virtual abolition of the canteen feature of the post exchange has made a universal accompaniment of every military post. I think it is beyond question that permission to sell beer in the post exchange would drive out of business at least two-thirds of the lower resorts in the vicinity of posts."

In 1905, when commanding the Department of the East, Gen. Frederick D. Grant reported:

"It is my belief that fully 75 per cent of these trials (court-martials) were due to the use of bad liquor dispensed to our soldiers by persons who conduct dens of vice in the vicinity of military posts. These depraved creatures and lewd women use every device in their power to induce the soldier to patronize their brothels, where those who yield to temptation are frequently drugged and robbed. It is distressing that the prosperity of the keepers of vile resorts is due to the activity of good and worthy, though misguided, citizens, who have succeeded in abolishing the canteen in the Army. With the establishment of the canteen, which was the soldiers' club, the influence of these demoralizing resorts near Army posts would be greatly reduced and many of them would disappear."

The following year he said:

"After another year's study * * * I am convinced that I underestimated the proportion. * * * I now believe that no less than 90 per cent of all the troubles that occur in the Army are due to the use of liquor."

I was with the American troops stationed at Peking during the Boxer War, 1901, and an inspection showed over 50 per cent of all patients under treatment were for venereal diseases. This alarming factor in connection with the subject of the canteen must be seriously considered. This disease always claims a large proportion of patients in a military hospital, but since the abolition of the canteen the percentage of these cases has almost doubled. When the Woman's Christian Temperance Union realizes that the result of the abolition of the post exchange has produced this enormous increase of wretchedness in the Army hospitals, I believe it will work as earnestly for the restoration of the canteen as it did for its abolition. A prominent United States Army officer in Peking, under date of July 9, 1901, and after the canteen had been abolished, wrote me:

"The Woman's Christian Temperance Union would have no fault to find with the post here. The men go outside and get drunk on sam shui in town and go to sleep in back yards and other worse places, but the sanctity of the Government reservation is maintained. The Germans have a Bierhalle on the wall at Hartman Gate. The Japanese have their canteen. The British have one in their grounds and bring their beer to their tables. The French soldier has his little bottle of wine at dinner. We alone are virtuous. We are the advocates of reform. We are the great hypocritical hippodrome—none like us."

And he spoke the truth. The curse of the Army is the groggeries and brothels that flourish near the outskirts of the posts, and the frightfully high percentage of venereal diseases result from and depend upon them. The increase has been almost in constant ratio. I saw this in Porto Rico after the Spanish-American War: Fifty-seven of the ninety-three patients in one hospital suffering from this disease alone. Medical officers of the Army state that since the abolition of the canteen the percentage of these cases has almost doubled. Personal observation in the United States military hospitals of Porto Rico and Cuba during and since the Spanish-American War, in China during the Boxer riots, in the Philippines, and in other places where our troops were stationed confirms this view.

In 1889, prior to the introduction of the canteen, the admission to hospitals for venereal diseases was 84.66 per 1,000; in 1893, after the canteen was established, it was reduced to 73.8 per 1,000. In 1901 the canteen was abolished, and in the following year, in an address before the Association of United States Military Surgeons, I pointed out in no uncertain language the danger to the Army from the great increase of venereal diseases likely to follow this abolition, but nothing was done to restore the canteen.

Three years later the admission from venereal disease had increased to 200.34 per 1,000, and last year—1910—the Surgeon General, in his report, says:

"The venereal peril has come to outweigh in importance any other sanitary question which now confronts the Army, and neither our national optimism nor the Anglo-Saxon disposition to ignore a subject which is offensive to public prudery can longer excuse a frank and honest confrontation of the problem."

In 1910 there were 14,640 hospital admissions from this cause alone, or about 20 per cent—one-fifth of the total enlisted strength of the Army.

This is in one single year. These figures are out of all proportion to those which obtain in European armies, in all of which canteens are maintained. In the British Army the hospital admissions from venereal diseases is 7.6 per cent; in the Hungarian Army, 4.5 per cent; in the French Army, 3.5 per cent; in the Prussian Army, 1.9 per cent; in the Bavarian Army, 1.5 per cent; and in the United States Army, 19.7 per cent.

Do not imagine for a moment that I am here as an advocate of highballs. As resident surgeon and chief of medical staff for eight years on Wards and Blackwells Islands I witnessed in my daily inspection of hospitals scenes which no modern Hogarth could depict. It is no metaphor to attribute the excesses of our population to the percentage of strong drink, for drunkenness and debauchery are inseparable with crime, poverty, and the effects upon the progeny. Personally almost a total abstainer, I would gladly see alcohol eliminated as a product from the face of the earth. Personally, too, I would abolish wars, and therefore armies and the necessities for canteens, but, unfortunately, this is not a personal matter. Of course the canteen is not an ideal institution; its most ardent advocates frankly admit that the total abolition of intoxicants in the Army is a desideratum devoutly to be wished; but, recognizing the impossibility of this ideal, the ablest and sanest officers of the Army advise the soldier's club, or canteen, as its nearest approach. When it was maintained men drank less, were surrounded by better influences, and returned to their reading rooms or other quarters sober and contented. When it was abolished they procured their liquor away from their posts, and left the rumholes for the brothels. When the misguided enthusiasts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union stop to reflect that the result of their influence in inducing Congress to abolish the post canteen has contributed more than any other cause to the production of this enormous increase of wretchedness in Army hospitals, and made many a husband, father, or lover the victim of this degrading disease and a focus of infection for its spread after the expiration of his enlistment, they may indulge in less self-congratulation, and conclude to cease interfering with institutions about which they are so hopelessly ignorant. In killing a mouse they resurrected a monster. Well may the poor soldier remark, "Deliver me from my friends and I will take care of my enemies."

Listen to what Dr. Prince A. Morrow, president of the American Society for Social and Moral Prophylaxis, says regarding the prevalence of these diseases and their danger to public health:

"In point of prevalence, they vastly overshadow all other infectious diseases, both acute and chronic combined. It is a conservative estimate that fully one-eighth of all human disease and suffering comes from this source alone. Moreover, the influence of these diseases fall most heavily upon the young during the most active productive period of life. Of the many men who contract these diseases a large proportion carry the infection into the family. Unfortunately, these diseases are markedly conspicuous in virulence and danger to the wife and mother in fulfilling the function for which marriage was instituted. There is abundance of statistical evidence to show that 80 per cent of the deaths from inflammatory diseases peculiar to women, 75 per cent of all special surgical operations performed on women, and over 60 per cent of the work done by specialists in diseases of women are the result of the gonococcus infection. Many are condemned to lifelong invalidism. There are in this country thousands of poor young women who are infected in their relations in marriage and their conceptional capacity destroyed, and the aspirations which center in motherhood and children swept away and the holy office of maternity discredited by bringing forth tainted, diseased, or dead children, and the women themselves often condemned to mutilation of their maternal organs to save their lives. The effects of these diseases when it has entered the marriage bond are not measured alone by the danger to the life and health of the mother, but are still further manifested in their danger to the offspring. Fully 80 per cent of the ophthalmia which blots out the eyes of babies and 20 per cent of all blindness is caused by this same infection. Syphilis (which I may say is specially prevalent in our tropical possessions) is the only disease which is transmitted to the offspring in full virulence. Its effects upon the function of conception are simply enormous. Sixty or eighty per cent of all infected children die before being born or come into the world with the mark of death upon them. Those that finally survive, 1 in 4 or 5, are the subjects of degenerative changes and organic defects, which may be transmitted to the third generation."

Thus you see just as in actual war, from which the soldier may return on his shield instead of bearing it, in the ultimate analysis of this question the women of the country are the chief sufferers.

Nor has this meddlesome interference ceased its diabolical work even with this record. Grave as it is, there is still another, almost equally bad. A new evil, almost unheard of prior to the abolition of the canteen, has fastened its fangs upon many of the unfortunates of the Army. As stated before, when deprived of stimulants in one way, they obtain them in another. I have it on no less authority than the present Surgeon General of the United States Army, that the use of opium and cocaine has increased to alarming proportions in the service. It is very difficult to prevent the introduction of contraband stimulants of this character, because they are so easily smuggled by the peddler or by the soldier when on pass. But numerous instances of the effect of these deleterious drugs are being reported. And thus the evil spreads.

The avowed purpose in abolishing the canteen was to increase the efficiency of the military establishment. Its effect has been to increase intemperance, disease, and desertion. It has embittered the men and driven them to the very excesses sought to be abolished. You can not legislate men to be virtuous or to be total abstainers; but you can, by judicious handling, promote chastity and temperance. The crowning glory of medicine lies in the prevention of disease and not in its cure. [Applause.]

The demands of military discipline require the soldier to surrender for the good of the state much of his individual liberty and many of the privileges enjoyed by other citizens. It is asked by the leading physicians of America whether it is wise to further restrict these privileges by legislation in a way which not only does not contribute to military discipline, but which impairs it. Soldiers are required by the special conditions of military life to give up their home life and the moral protection of marriage, and to live a life of enforced celibacy. Is it wise to diminish the protection of their club and increase the moral and physical risks of their environment by an act of Congress? The canteen led the hard drinker to less indulgence and removed the temptation which always clings to forbidden fruits. It fostered moderation and its abolition angered the men. Soldiers who are ready to fight at the bugle call or to face the firing line of death in this or any other country are men of life and action and not to be tied to apron strings. They regard this law as an insult to their manhood, a deprivation of their natural rights. A glass of beer is not injurious to them, and they know it, and they sneeringly criticize Congressmen, the paid servants of the Government who retain their well-patronized cloak-room, with its private stock of whisky, but who rob the soldiers, other paid servants of the same Government, of their right to take a glass of beer, and who dares say they are not right? [Applause.]

The law as it stands is little less than a tragedy. Soldiers, who are the guardians of the country's honor, are driven to crime and debauchery and disease by the lawmakers of the land. The alternative will come; the tragedy is here. How long it will remain depends, as Mr. BARTHOLOMEW says, upon the amount of hypocrisy and cowardice there is in Congress. Every Congressman, every intelligent man in Congress and out of it, knows perfectly well that the abolition of the canteen was a blow at temperance, a direct incentive to drunkenness, and a flagrant cause of the spread of disease. We therefore ask for its restoration, with its former privileges, for the following reasons:

First. Because it was an institution where the soldiers could pass their leisure in wholesome surroundings, under military discipline, where whisky and light wines were never sold. I have never heard that questioned in any canteen, and I have seen them all over the world, where intemperance was never tolerated; where relief could be found for the men from the monotony of post life, and as a glass of beer and sandwiches or biscuits could always be purchased, his craving for strong drink was satisfied, and many men who before or when opportunity offered were hard drinkers became, through this discipline temperate.

Second. Because its abolition has proved a wretched failure. Instead of it reducing intemperance the law has increased drunkenness, immorality, insubordination, and desertion—and I might add insanity.

Third. Because its absence has driven the soldier to seek recreation outside of the limits of camp in those curses of the Army, the rum shop and the brothel, found near every post, and which flourish on the earnings and weaknesses of the enlisted man. Crime and debauchery thrive under these conditions where the soldier, led by his desire for amusement, is the victim. The establishment of the canteen did away with a vast majority of these disgraceful resorts. Since its abolition they have reappeared and were never so flourishing as they are to-day.

Fourth. Because its reestablishment will reduce the shocking percentage of venereal diseases, the greatest menace to the health of the Army.

Fifth. Because those best qualified to render a fair verdict, the medical and line officers of the Army and members of the leading medical associations of the country, the wives of officers and enlisted men, indeed all who have the honor of the Army at heart, stand almost as a unit for the repeal of the present law and for the restoration of the canteen.

Sixth. Because the chief supporters of the present law are the whisky dealers and the interests who are so enormously benefited from its enforcement.

A bill for the repeal of the law is now before Congress, introduced by Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLOMEW, and I appeal to each and every woman who honors her country and its defenders to join in a concerted movement of organizations and societies in this purpose. Also to request the Members of the House of Representatives and the Senator representing the district in which she resides to use his influence for its passage. Such an action would replace the responsibility for the morale and discipline of the Army in the hands of those properly delegated to administer its affairs, and Congress would thereby right a serious wrong and to some extent restore its own dignity which has so yielded to the clamor of ignorant fanaticism. [Applause.]

Thereupon Dr. Slicer read a letter from Gen. Leonard Wood, in which he advocated the restoration of the canteen. He followed this by reading a letter from the commander of the Grand Army of the Republic in the State of New York. This was followed by reading some resolutions from the joint board of garrisons of Greater New York and adjacent territory of the Army and Navy Union, passed at its regular meeting held in Brooklyn January 14. This was followed by telegram, as follows:

"The welfare of the enlisted man demands the restoration of the canteen. His physical and moral health has suffered severely from its abolishment. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union should not be blamed in this matter so much as certain distilling interests who fraudulently have made use of its misdirected zeal.

"(Signed) OWEN WISTER."

Dr. Slicer then introduced Dr. Herbert Shipman, late chaplain of the United States Army, now a minister in this city.

ADDRESS OF REV. MR. SHIPMAN.

MR. SHIPMAN. Whosoever has the temerity to speak on any phase of the so-called liquor question or a platform other than that of total abstinence must needs protest at the outset that, however appearances may be against him, he is really at heart on the side of temperance. So much he must offer by way of propitiation to the gods of conventional respectability. I hasten, therefore, to make that protestation. It was because I believed in temperance that at one time I opposed the movement to abolish the Army canteen, and it is because I still believe in temperance that I now rejoice in the possibility of its reinstatement.

I opposed the movement to abolish it, as I now welcome every effort to bring it back—first of all, on general grounds. With all sympathy and respect for the motives and ideals of those who cling to the principle of prohibition, I do not believe that that principle will ever solve the question of temperance; I believe it blocks the way.

It proclaims itself, indeed, the bearer of the Christian standard as against the evils of intemperance. And it has fought a good fight and kept the faith as it has seen the faith, bravely and uncompromisingly. But it remains a fact that the New Testament, straightforwardly translated and understood, leads no authority to the principle of prohibition.

Just as little has it the general support of modern science. If it can marshal impressive names in support of its contentions, the opposing creed can marshal names every bit as impressive and more in numbers. Moreover, whenever and wherever given an opportunity to demonstrate its working it has succeeded only in demonstrating its inability to work. Any man knows this who travels with open eyes through the so-called prohibition sections either of this country or of Canada. There is no need for him to seek diligently for the evidence until he find it; it forces itself upon him. It staggers from the drug shops, the closet bars, the "speak-easies," and "blind tigers" of every kind, and plants itself squarely before his eyes. Prohibition not only fails to attain the result at which it aims, but almost invariably there follow worse evils in its train than those it attempts to cure. "I speak," Hugo Münsterberg says, "as a psychotherapist whose experience covers the whole country when I say that the spreading of cocaine and morphinism, of sexual perversions and ruinous habits among the abstainers is alarming."

Its tendency, too, is to eliminate the milder beverages, which are difficult to transport and conceal, in favor of gin and whisky, often of the vilest quality, and to substitute lonely drinking—of all forms the most ruinous and hardest to cure—for drinking in social company under the restraining influence of public opinion.

It alienates the good will and influence of the moderate drinker, the man who believes himself to be, and is, a temperate man, and who resents, not unnaturally, being classed as "a liquor man" with the bar-room tippler and corner loafer. It fosters hypocrisy; it tempts men to do in underhand ways that which they believe they have a right to do but for which, if caught, they are liable to punishment. These things are bad; but worst of all is the fact that prohibition forced upon an unwilling minority, often with the assistance of the liquor dealers, sows the seeds of disrespect and disregard for law.

In a country and under a Government such as ours, whose stability rests upon the conscience of the people, to foster any theory which dulls the public conscience to the obligation of even a single law is a dangerous experiment. By so much the moral tone is lowered; by so much every law loses something of its sanctity.

For these reasons and others I am opposed to the major premise of prohibition—that total abstinence is the only road to temperance; and therefore I am opposed to the conclusion drawn from that premise—that in the interest of temperance the Army canteen should be, and is of right, abolished.

I am against this conclusion not only on this general ground, however. I am against it on the more specific ground that the canteen in practical operation has proved itself the most effective force for temperance the Army has ever known.

I wonder if all the estimable women who some years ago worked with such fatal success to get the canteen abolished knew what they were doing. I wonder if they knew exactly what the canteen is and how it operates. If they did know, I wonder that they worked so hard against the best interests of our soldiers. If they did not know, I wonder why they worked at all until they knew.

I am not jesting when I say that at the time the canteen was abolished there were those who honestly believed they were working against the use in the Army of a round, metallic vessel, somewhat like a hot-water bottle, attached to each soldier's belt, filled in the morning with some kind of spirituous liquor, and, when the silent stars looked down upon the conclusion of his labors, emptied of its contents. "Why," they asked with glowing indignation, "why should the Government furnish canteens to our Army? Why should the soldiers carry them? Why should they put them to their lips and drain away their manhood?"

As a matter of fact, as we who are more enlightened know, the canteen was one department of the soldiers' store, or "post exchange," in which the sale of beer, to be consumed on the premises, was allowed.

Surely, if beer was ever sold under conditions which would compel even the most scrupulous to confess that the least, last possibility of evil was minimized to the vanishing point, those conditions obtained in the Army canteen. Its management was in the hands of officers of the Army, competent men, of ability and high character, whose business it was to safeguard the interests of the men under their command and who had no other interest in the matter whatsoever; the quality of the beer was carefully inspected, and the amount allowed each man strictly limited; the demoralizing system of "treating," almost universal in the ordinary saloon, was absolutely forbidden; the surroundings were clean and decent, in striking contrast to the low dives, appropriately called "hog ranches," with which nearly every village near an Army post is filled. In this connection let me add two facts: First, that when the canteen was originally established at West Point, 17 saloons in the nearest village were forced out of business; and, second, that when a movement was on foot to abolish the canteen on the West Point Reservation, identically the same petitions to bring this about were circulated by the so-called temperance advocates and by representatives of the lowest class of liquor dealers in the adjacent village of Highland Falls.

Under the canteen system, the man who wanted his glass of beer got it openly and was not tempted to sneak to the nearest saloon, with its vile whisky, its viler atmosphere, its degrading habits and retainers, female as well as male, there to debase his manhood, endanger his health, and lower both his regard for discipline and his moral tone; the profits of the canteen sales, so far from going into the pockets of individuals to whose interest it was to increase them by any and every means, were returned to the men themselves in the form of better food, means for recreation, material for reading and instruction, and comforts and delicacies for the sick in hospital.

These were some, not all, of the advantages of the canteen system. As such they were recognized almost universally by those who best knew the Army and its needs, and who above all others had its well-being close to their hearts. They have been lost to the Army through the efforts of amateurs as ignorant and shortsighted as they were doubtless well meaning. A heavy burden of responsibility rests upon them.

It is now time that this unfortunate and disastrous experiment were ended.

Temperance is a moral quality, part of the make-up of a man's soul. You can not compel him to be temperate by external restrictions and prohibitions any more than you can compel him by the same means to be pure in heart. The way to temperance lies not through prohibition or any other quick and easy panacea, but through the education of the individual will and conscience to meet and overcome the temptations which must inevitably, and for its development and greater good, enter every human life.

The system which, while leaving room for choice, without which a man is not a man, works at the same time for self-government and self-restraint is on the side of the truest temperance. And this, exactly, is the claim I make for the system of which I have been speaking.

I speak not only on behalf of the comfort and contentment of our enlisted soldiers, not only on behalf of their rights as men, but above all on behalf of decency and order, on behalf of discipline and manly self-control, on behalf of temperance in its truest form, when I say again that this system of which the Army has been robbed by ignorance, prejudice, and fanaticism, should be restored.

Largely through the influence of our women it was taken from the Army. Is it not fitting, therefore, that through their more enlightened influence it should be given back?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and before beginning I will say that I will address myself to the subject suddenly broached by the gentleman from Missouri, and I will ask permission to extend my remarks and insert some matter similar to what the gentleman has requested to insert in his case.

The CHAIRMAN. That permission has been granted by general order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri refers to a certain list of medical men. I think it is only fair on behalf of those medical men to state that they made their report on the same misleading information that the gentleman has been quoting—information that is absolutely contrary to the facts. The official reports of the increase of these diseases are due to the fact that the same year the canteen, so-called, was abolished—and I will inform the gentlemen here that the canteen has not been abolished, but the use of beverages containing alcohol has been abolished in the canteen.

Now, the year that that came in there was a fundamental change in the method of inspection. A new system began, and a proper consideration of parallel conditions, before and after, go to show beyond a question of doubt that in the matter of diseases there has been a decided improvement. Furthermore, it goes to show that in the matter of loss of time from intemperance and in cases of arrest for drunkenness, and all similar records, a most decided and important and valuable improvement in the health and morals of the service has resulted.

Mr. Chairman, it is singular to me that just when the British Government, and the French Government, and the German Government, and practically every important government in the world, with large armies and navies, are taking every available measure to make their armies and navies absolutely dry, totally abstaining, that there should be such a widespread movement in America to reintroduce beverages containing alcohol in our Army. I wish to point out the substance of the contention of the gentleman.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman knows the reasons why there is such a large—

Mr. HOBSON. I am going to give them. The contention of the gentleman from Missouri is that this particular ingredient in a beverage, known as alcohol, is beneficial to the human organism and in turn may tend to make the human being that takes it more moral and more temperate.

In the Boer War the investigation of a scientific commission, appointed without prejudice by the British Crown, showed absolutely that the defeats of the British, the regulars going down before the Boers, the lack of stamina and endurance, were due to the use of beverages containing alcohol—even the temperate use.

And further investigation showed that of 11,000 British subjects in the city of London who came up for examination by the recruiting service, only 1,200 reached the physical requirement.

And the scientific investigation that followed as to the cause resulted unanimously in the decision that it was due to the use of alcoholic beverages. The French Government made a similar investigation—in a country where drunkenness is unknown. I was there for three years, and never saw a drunken Frenchman. They came to the same conclusion, namely, that the element of degeneracy in France—the high death rate, the low birth rate, and all the signs of degeneracy—were due to this cause. Then the patient Germans took it up, and they came to exactly the same conclusion. The German Emperor is the man who is leading the movement in Germany, not only to have his army and the navy absolutely dry, but he has appealed to his countrymen to cut out alcohol. He has stated in so many words that that nation will march to the front in war or peace that is willing to remove this cause of degeneracy.

On what is that based? It will not take long to tell you. It has now been settled by laboratories in all parts of the world; it is no longer open to discussion; it is one of the great accepted facts of modern science. It is revolutionary, like the discovery that the world was round instead of flat. They have now established beyond peradventure that alcohol is not a simple hydrocarbon, analogous to the starches and sugars—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that my time be extended for five minutes, the same extension of time which was granted to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBSON. They have found that alcohol is a toxin, is a waste product, is the excretion of a living organism; that you can not produce it unless you bring in the yeast or ferment germ. Nor can you produce it unless you produce liquid in which that germ can carry on the life processes, and the alcohol that comes off is the excretion of those germs. Now, when that is established, it settles this question once and for all time. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that he might as well realize that he has a losing cause; he might as well try to make this earth flat or make water run up hill as to permanently maintain the position he has taken. There is a biological law that knows no exception; that the toxin of one form of life is a poison to that form of life and every form of life of a higher order. You can not make alcohol of more than 13 per cent concentration.

Alcohol will kill the yeast germ that produced it when it reaches that concentration. It will not only be a poison to itself, but to every form of life of the highest order. The yeast germ is below all animal organism. It is below most of the plants. It is bound to be a poison, and you can not escape it. It is a loathsome poison, without food value, without medicinal value, though it may fool you. It is not a stimulant, but lowers the pulse beat from 15 to 20 a minute, from the taking of 1 ounce of alcohol. It is classed now definitely with chloroform and ether as a narcotic poison. But, more than that, not only must it be a poison under all circumstances, but it has certain unique peculiarities as a poison. It not only attacks every tissue which it touches, but it has a particular affinity for the cells in the body which represent an upward line of evolution. That may be because those cells are young and tender, but it is nevertheless a fact that the characteristic of this poison is to attack, in every living organism, those tender little cells along the line upon which nature is developing evolution.

Man is evolving chiefly in the gray matter of the brain the convulsions of the brain. This poison has a deadly effect upon the gray matter. A single drink, and every drink, will paralyze for the time being the little layer of cells which the man has been tending to add in his day and generation. Nature causes each generation to add a little layer which, if it did not degenerate, would continue the evolution onward. Continued drink will absolutely wipe out these layers, and a man can in a short time cut down the evolution of his past. He will reach the plane ultimately of the semicivilized, the semisavage, and on down to the brute. In a few years he can wipe out the evolution of a thousand years of his ancestry.

These truths are well established. One more astounding fact is that nature regards degeneration, interfering with the line of its evolution, as the deadly, unpardonable sin. She strikes at the life of the one guilty of the sin. A single drink, with the alcohol passing through the veins, instantly makes every white blood corpuscle in the system drunk for the time being.

Under the microscope it was found that even a moderate drink of alcoholic beverage passing quickly into the blood paralyzes the white blood corpuscles. They behave like drunken men. In pursuit they can not catch the disease germs. In conflict they can not hold the disease germs for devouring, and they can not operate in great phalanxes, as they do when sober, against such powerful germs as those of consumption.

Every time a man takes a drink of alcoholic beverage he lays himself open for a time to contracting diseases. Every time a man takes a drink he puts his life in peril. No wonder the mortality statistics show, as they do, that a total abstainer has nearly twice the security and hold on life that the average drinker has and about three times the hold of heavy drinkers and those engaged in the liquor traffic.

If the drinks are repeated the microscope shows that the fighting powers of the white blood corpuscles are permanently impaired, even when they are not actually drunk. This accounts for the lowered vitality of regular drinkers, even though temperate.

After long-continued drinking, even though temperate, the microscope shows that the white blood corpuscles, with the serum which contains their vegetable food continually sucked up by the dehydrating toxin, become carnivorous and begin to feed upon the tissues and organs like disease germs. The favorite tissue food of the degenerate corpuscles are the tender cells of latest development. In the human being the latest development is the brain. The microscope shows the degenerate corpuscles, with the goods upon them, down in their bodies the gray matter of the brain. This accounts for the tremendous mortality among heavy drinkers and for the degeneracy that will be referred to later.

THE GREAT DESTROYER.

It is difficult to say in any particular case whether having alcohol in the system caused a patient to take a disease or caused a patient to die, and "alcoholism" attributed to men who die in delirium tremens is the only record of death ordinarily kept against alcohol. But the British Government, in conjunction with English life insurance companies, from the records of millions of cases, has been able to determine the death rate of total abstainers and of those who drink.

Statistics compiled by insurance companies show that the death rate for the population at large is 1,000 deaths per year out of every 61,215 of the population, and that the death rate of total abstainers is 560 per year out of the same number and for liquor dealers 1,642 deaths per year out of the same number. These figures, resulting from many millions of cases, can be taken as accurate. They show that 440 deaths out of every 1,000 deaths, nearly one-half of the deaths that occur, are due to alcohol. Applied to this country, over 680,000 deaths per year in continental United States, or over 725,000 per year in the United States and its possessions. In other words, alcohol is killing our people at the rate of nearly 2,000 men a day every day in the year.

ALCOHOL TEN THOUSAND TIMES MORE DESTRUCTIVE THAN WAR.

The Army War College at Washington made an investigation of the destructiveness of war. Taking all the wars of the world, from the Russo-Japanese War back to 500 B. C., the War College found that the total number of killed and wounded in battle amounts to about 2,800,000, of which it is estimated that about 700,000 were killed and something over 2,000,000 wounded.

The comparative figures show the appalling fact that alcohol is killing off as many Americans every year as all the wars of the world have killed in battle in 2,300 years.

Applied to the whole white race, we find that alcohol is killing 3,500,000 white men every year, five times as many as have been killed in war in 2,300 years; so that, stated mathematically, alcohol is ten thousand times more destructive than all wars combined. No wonder the Governments investigating the subject have found that war has been only a secondary cause of national decline, and that alcohol has been the real destroyer that has overthrown all the great nations of the past and is now undermining the great nations of to-day.

ALCOHOL'S WOUNDED TO-DAY ARE MORE THAN 100,000,000 WHITE MEN.

The figures of the British Government and English life insurance companies as to the effect of drinking on longevity are stated as follows:

If a young man at the age of 20 is a total abstainer and remains a total abstainer, his prospect of life is 44 years, and he will live to the average age of 64, but if he is a temperate regular drinker his prospect of life will be 31 years and he will live to the average age of 51, after losing 13 years out of his life. If he is a heavy drinker, his prospect of life is 15 years and he will die at the average age of 35, after losing 29 years out of his life. Conservative estimates place the number of confirmed drunkards in the United States at something over 1,000,000, of whom 300,000 die every year; the heavy drinkers at over 4,000,000; and temperate regular drinkers at over 20,000,000. A soldier wounded in battle and losing 10 years of his life as a consequence would be classed as seriously wounded. The confirmed drunkards and heavy drinkers together, 5,000,000 in number, must be looked upon as mortally wounded and the temperate regular drinkers as seriously wounded, making a total of over 25,000,000 Americans wounded by alcohol to-day, more than ten times as many as wounded in all the battles of the world since the dawn of history. The estimates for the white race make over 125,000,000 white men to-day wounded by alcohol.

If a great military power were to declare war on unprepared America to-day every patriotic heart would be filled with anxiety. I know the full significance of war, especially when a nation is unprepared. But if I had the choice of having alcohol continue its deadly ravages with the Nation at peace or of having it wiped off the face of the land with a declaration of war by all the nations of the earth, I would not hesitate for a moment; I would take sober, undegenerate America and face the combined world in arms.

ALCOHOL DEGENERATES.

The full ravages of alcohol are not measured even by the appalling list of killed and wounded. War kills and wounds; alcohol kills and wounds ten thousand times more than all war combined, and in addition it degenerates. Its toxin attacks with special virility the young, tender cells associated with evolution. A plant or vegetable or fruit steadily evolving some color or form under the process of cultivation when watered with water to which a small quantity of alcohol is added will quickly cease to evolve and will lose the color and form and revert backward toward the condition when it grew wild. If a young domestic animal is brought up on a fare to which a small ration of alcohol is added, by the time it is grown it will lose those qualities acquired in domesticity.

THE CURSE OF THE RED MAN AND THE BLACK MAN.

If a peaceable red man is subjected to the regular use of alcoholic beverage, he will speedily be put back to the plane of the savage. The Government long since recognized this and absolutely prohibits the introduction of alcoholic beverage into an Indian reservation. If a negro takes up a regular use of alcoholic beverage, in a short time he will degenerate to the level of the cannibal.

CONQUERS THE NOBLEST WHITE MEN.

No matter how high the stage of evolution, the result is the same. A white man with great self-control, considerate, tender-hearted, who would not willingly harm an insect, will be degenerated by regular use of alcoholic beverage to the point where he will strike with a dagger or fire a shot to kill with little or no provocation.

THE OVERSHADOWING CAUSE OF CRIME, PAUPERISM, AND INSANITY.

Though at first a tender, loving husband and parent, he will degenerate to the point where he will be cruel to his own flesh and blood. It is conservatively estimated that 95 per cent of all the acts and crimes of violence committed in civilized communities are the direct result of men being put down by alcohol toward a plane of savagery. The degenerating process strikes at the integrity of the reason and is the chief cause of idiocy and insanity. It wipes out self-control, self-respect, the sense of honor, the moral sense, and produces the bulk of tramps, paupers, vagabonds.

DEFIES NATURE AND NATURE'S GOD.

In every living thing there is the evolutionary impulse to rise and progress. In the human family man is not changing much in his physical nature, but is evolving chiefly in his nervous system, building up those delicate centers of the brain upon whose activities rest the moral sense. Nature is trying to produce men of high character, a race of true, noble men. Alcoholic beverages, even in moderation, reverse the processes of nature and set back the purposes of creation.

BRINGS NATURE'S CURSE—BLIGHTS PROGENY.

Nature is pitiless when her processes are reversed. She abhors degeneracy and will not tolerate its perpetuation. With parents properly mated and undegenerated the offspring will multiply and be higher and nobler in each succeeding generation. But woe to the offspring if the parents degenerate themselves. Nature will blast the progeny and everything associated with its production.

BLIGHTS THE FRUITING OF PLANTS AND THE OFFSPRING OF ANIMALS.

Upon a fruit tree watered with alcohol mixed with the water the fruit will fall untimely. With animals the law is the same. Scientists selected from a litter of spaniels two little brothers exactly alike in infancy, and brought them up, one as an alcoholic and the other as a total abstainer, giving the former only a small quantity of alcohol with his food, about equivalent in proportion to what benighted parents often give their children in beer or light wine mixed with water. From another litter of spaniels they selected two little sisters exactly alike in infancy, and brought them up in the same way, one as an alcoholic, the other as a total abstainer. When the four dogs were grown they were mated, the two alcoholics together and the two total abstainers together, and the process was repeated. The two mothers and the offspring were placed under close scientific observation. Extraordinary phenomena set in with the alcoholic mother. She experienced difficulties and accidents, suffered great travail in birth, and finally died in pupbirth with the fifth litter, a phenomenon unknown before. Many of her offspring were born dead. Many of them died in infancy, and of those that survived only 17.3 per cent were normal.

The little abstaining mother had no such experience; she bore large litters of healthy, strong pups, of which 90.5 per cent were absolutely normal.

BLIGHTS THE PROGENY OF MAN.

The same inexorable law holds for man as for animals and plants. A scientist having investigated more than 800 cases, announces that of children born to alcoholic parents, 1 of every 5 will be hopelessly insane, 1 out of 3 will be hysterical or epileptic. More than two-thirds will be degenerate. Another scientist located 10 large families in which both parents were alcoholic, and in the same localities, with other conditions practically the same, 10 large families in which both parents were total abstainers. Of the 57 children of the alcoholic parents, 10 were deformed, 6 were epileptic, 6 were idiotic, 25 were nonviable, only 17 per cent were normal, 83 per cent being abnormal. Of the 61 children of the total-abstaining parents 10.5 per cent only were abnormal, and these chiefly backward, while 89.5 per cent were absolutely normal. Seventeen per cent were normal in the one case and 89.5 per cent in the other case, a difference of 72.5 per cent.

Parents by becoming alcoholic will sacrifice three-fourths of their children on the altar of drink.

ALCOHOL THE CURSE OF THE PERILS OF CHILDBIRTH AND THE DANGER OF RACE SUICIDE.

Another scientist after wide investigation has found that in only 1 per cent of cases do accidents occur in maternity to mothers where the parents are total abstainers, while 5.25 per cent occur where the parents are regular temperate drinkers, and 7.32 per cent where the parents are heavy drinkers. In the case of total-abstaining parents the deaths in infancy among their children will be 13 per cent; in the case of temperate regular drinkers 23 per cent, and heavy drinkers 32 per cent. Of the children of drinkers 10 per cent will have consumption, of the children of total abstainers only 1.8 per cent. Those who drink alcoholic beverage should realize the terrible price they pay. For even temperate regular drinking they increase over 400 per cent the chances of accidents in maternity. They nearly double the chances of their children dying in infancy, and they undermine the health and normality of those that survive. A man may take chances with himself, but if he has a spark of nobility in his soul he will take care how he tampers with a deadly poison that will cause the helpless little children that he brings into the world to be deformed, idiotic, epileptic, insane.

THE ONLY RATIONAL LIFE.

In the light of the truth that every drink endangers health, the terrible truth that alcohol destroys and degenerates, and that it blights progeny, there can be from the standpoint of the individual but one rational course of life with regard to this deadly poison, and that is a life of absolute, total abstinence.

The standpoint of the individual is not the only standpoint from which this great destroyer must be examined. His blight is as deadly for society as it is for the individual. We must examine him from the standpoint of the State. In later remarks I will deal with this part of the question. In the meantime I will remind Members that I have this question printed in a speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, called "The great destroyer," and shall be glad to supply copies to Members for their own use or for distribution.

But in the light of these truths, how utterly absurd to maintain that serving beer inside of a post would reduce the drinking of whisky outside of the post or give the post any more control over the dens outside.

How ridiculous to contend that this poison, which degenerates and places a man on a lower plane, with his self-control gone, reduces the violations of the rules of morality and chastity. There is not a red-light district in the world not intimately associated with and built upon the distribution of this poison. I protest against this continual slander upon our Army. It is almost sacrilege to bring in the names of women. For each one of the misguided women on the petitions of the gentleman from Missouri I can send in a thousand women who would protest with their latest breath against introducing beer into the daily routine presence of the young soldiers, who enlist most of them as total abstainers, tending to start them on the downward path with the pretext of making it easier for a few old drinkers to get their drinks.

At a later date I will present in extenso this question of the proposed restoration of alcohol to the Army canteen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a couple of minutes.

Mr. HOBSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to say to these gentlemen that they are engaged in discussing a very interesting subject, but to-day is the day allotted to the business of my committee, and I have given up a portion of it to the Committee on Military Affairs. We want to discuss the war-claims bill. Gentlemen can continue this present discussion at some other time.

Mr. HOBSON. I will state to the gentleman that I did not precipitate this discussion.

Mr. SIMS. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, what is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is this an academic discussion of the canteen?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In line with the suggestion recently made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there will be presented to the House a motion to recommit that portion of the bill which refers to the increase of pay for foreign service, I trust that when that motion is presented to this House the action of the committee cutting off extra pay for foreign service, which was determined by a majority of a single vote, will be reversed in the House on a roll call.

To my mind the distinction which should apply as between the pay of the man serving in continental United States and the man who serves in what is termed the foreign service in this particular bill is by no means ordinary. It is based upon conditions unusual and extraordinary, and I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that this House should impose upon the boys who have enlisted in the Army the burden that this bill would lay upon their shoulders while they are absent from home.

Ten per cent additional pay for officers and 20 per cent additional pay for men is for what purpose? It is for the purpose of harmonizing the difference between the actual service, the actual hazards, the actual hardships that are encountered by the man at home and the man abroad.

In the Philippine service to-day, Mr. Chairman, the boys are far more frequently finding their way into the hospitals than in the United States proper. In the continental service of the United States they are surrounded by the comforts that go with the ordinary American life. What is the difference actually between the two? Maj. Munson, an eminent authority on questions of this kind, has prepared some interesting and instructive statistics showing the strikingly different state of affairs existing at home and in the Philippines.

Under the conditions of peace prevailing during the five years from 1906 to 1910, the comparative hazard of the Army serving within the continental United States—excluding Alaska—and American troops serving in the Philippine Islands, as shown by the reports of the Surgeon General of the Army, is as follows:

Years.	Troops serving in—	Admissions to hospital, per 1,000 troops.	Deaths, per 1,000 troops.	Constant noneffective, per 1,000 troops.
1906.....	United States.....	1,170.93	5.28	46.92
	Philippines.....	1,709.32	9.11	63.35
1907.....	United States.....	1,172.04	5.63	45.22
	Philippines.....	1,483.12	8.54	55.49
1908.....	United States.....	1,148.59	5.35	41.19
	Philippines.....	1,439.65	8.65	53.35
1909.....	United States.....	1,024.37	4.84	39.70
	Philippines.....	1,348.02	6.43	52.57
1910.....	United States.....	899.25	4.42	33.95
	Philippines.....	1,242.65	5.19	45.45
Average for 5 years.....	United States.....	1,084.83	5.10	41.39
	Philippines.....	1,442.73	7.58	54.04

These figures show statistically that during the past five years there actually occurred proportionately 49.1 per cent more deaths among troops in the Philippines than in the United States, 32.9 per cent more disability requiring hospital care, and 30.8 per cent more inability to do duty as a result thereof.

But these figures, cogent as they are, do not fully represent the actual results of tropical service on health and life expectancy. Severe and chronic cases are habitually invalided from the Philippines, where their disability developed, back to the United States, where they die, are discharged for disability, or spend long periods on sick report. It thus happens that the statistical health reports show rates lower than they should be for the Philippine Islands, and causes incident to service therein, and unduly increase the apparent rates for the United States through the taking up of invalids returned from the Tropics, where they acquired their disability.

What is there to offset this condition of affairs? Not only are no sick soldiers sent from the United States to the Tropics to facilitate recovery, but the presumably well soldiers are carefully examined before embarkation to make sure that they are in condition to stand the greater strain of tropical service. There is thus more sickness and death due to tropical service and less incident to service in the United States than is at once apparent from the statistics.

The present tropical service pay was given by Congress in the desire to compensate officers and men for the greater expense, discomfort, and hazard incident to that service, but the tropical service pay has never done this fully. Officers get an increase of 10 per cent and enlisted men of 20 per cent under conditions where their expectancy of life is cut down at least 50 per cent, their health is reduced by at least 33 per cent, and their ability to perform duty by at least 31 per cent—and in all these respects to an undoubtedly greater but undetermined degree than is shown statistically by the Surgeon General.

In addition to all this I have been informed, and I believe, that the additional pay allowed these officers who are transported from time to time does not in the case of actual travel make up the difference in their actual necessary expenditures. It costs an additional sum of from $300 to $500 for an officer to travel back and forth above the allowance ordinarily given him.

Do you mean to say that there is no difference in the service rendered by a man in the military service assigned to duty in the Capital of the Nation, where his family has the best medical care the world affords, where at his children's disposal are the best public schools in the world, where there are all the refinements of society and all those things that make life pleasant—do you mean to tell me that there is no distinction between his surroundings here and those of the man 10,000 miles away, in the wilds of the Philippines? Do you mean to tell me that a man who is compelled to maintain two establishments, one here at home, because his wife and little children, perchance because of some physical disability or ailment, dare not face the hardships of the Tropics, and who is also compelled to maintain himself beyond the sea, away from his home and family—do you mean to say that there is no distinction between that man and the one who is permitted to maintain himself in his own home with his own family in this country, enjoying their society 365 days and nights of the year? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I should like five minutes more.

A MEMBER. Regular order!

Mr. HAY. I move that all debate close on this amendment.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. HAY. We have full discussion on this proposition in the general debate, and we must end the consideration of this bill at some time or other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HAY. I offered an amendment, and I understand that all debate on it is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands, but the Chair does not know for what purpose the gentleman from Wyoming rises.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was unable to be here yesterday when certain features of this bill were under discussion. I do not want to detain the committee at this time, but I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the Record on some features of the bill that were discussed yesterday.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman already has that right.

The CHAIRMAN. Permission to extend remarks has already been granted to all Members. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting as a new section after section 7:
"Sec. 8. That the appropriations herein provided for the several departments consolidated under this act shall be available for the consolidated corps herein created."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 8 in the bill should be numbered section 9.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that change will be made by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 8. That nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to separate any officer from the Army or to diminish the rank now held by him, and that all laws and parts of laws, so far as they are inconsistent with the terms of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 61, line 15, after the word "him," add the following: "Or to reduce the pay he is now receiving."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment, if adopted, would do away with the paragraph just agreed to.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is mistaken in the matter of the provision in the previous paragraph. This would only say that his pay shall not be reduced.

Mr. HAY. The preceding paragraph that has just been agreed to says that hereafter the service as a cadet of the United States Military Academy, or as a naval cadet or midshipman, shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of an officer of the Army. If the gentleman's amendment is agreed to that will nullify that provision which the committee has just agreed to.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will simply remark that if that provision which the gentleman refers to were already the law his point of order might lie, but that provision is not law. It is only a part of the bill and may be modified by provisions in other parts of the bill. It is just like section 8, which modifies parts that have already been passed upon in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, while I do not favor the amendment, I think it is clearly in order. The Chair can not undertake to determine whether its adoption will be consistent with other parts of the bill.

Mr. HAY. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee long. I do not believe that I ever heard of a case like this—I may be mistaken, but I will ask if any gentleman knows of a case to remind me—I do not believe that I ever heard of a legislative act in any country affecting the pay of enlisted men or officers in the service of the army or the navy providing for reducing the pay being received at the time because, in an inherent way, that is a part, you might say, of a contract. This is like an ex post facto law. It is, I believe, absolutely unprecedented. It is a provision intended to reduce expenses and, perhaps, Members might believe it ought to be the system to prevail in the future, but why should Members make a precedent of this kind in violation of all precedents, really in the nature of an ex post facto law, and break the contract with men in the service who entered the service with the full understanding that the present rates would be the basis of their pay? Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time to put in on another proviso.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 61, line 14, after the word "officer," by inserting the words "or enlisted man."

Page 61, line 15, after the word "rank" insert the words "or pay." In the same line, after the word "held," insert the words "or received."

Mr. HAY. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. The purpose of it seems to be to get into this section the words "enlisted man" and provide that the pay he is now receiving, which is part of the foreign-service pay, shall not be taken away from him by anything in this act.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. That is precisely the purpose.

Mr. HAY. Well, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 61, add as a new section the following:
SEC. 10. That the provisions of this act shall not take effect before January 1, 1915.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order—that it is new legislation.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will say that unless the chairman of the committee accepts the amendment providing that these officers and men may have opportunity to adjust themselves to these changed conditions, I shall not press it, either as to the point of order or as to the amendment itself.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it can be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not believe it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will employ the time at my disposal simply to conclude the statement of my position on this whole matter. I suppose that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will say that I am making an attack upon the Democratic Party. As this bill is closing, I simply desire to lay before my colleagues in the Democratic Party that it is in my judgment the most imperative duty of our party to give due and careful consideration—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, what is before the committee?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I make the point of order to the amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, I wish to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to have the gentleman lecture the Democratic Party.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing this measure. I expected the gentleman from New York to rise. He is exceedingly adroit—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Then I shall discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule, as a matter of course, that the gentleman must speak to the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman must not discuss anything else.

Mr. HOBSON. I will remark, in connection with the gentleman's adroitness—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman discussing anything except the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is offered in very good faith. I have seen adroitness in the matter of amendments employed on many sides, and I can remember one time when the gentleman from New York was lined up with the enemy—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If that point of order is insisted upon, the gentleman must proceed in order.

Mr. HOBSON. I will now move an amendment to my amendment, to strike out the last word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I insist on the regular order.

Mr. HOBSON. Then I will discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is whether the gentleman's amendment is in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized to speak to his point of order.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. When the question of good order is being discussed, is it improper to mention the name of the Democratic Party?

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOBSON. If bad order were being discussed, we could very well mention the Republican Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized to discuss the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from New York—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman confine himself to a discussion of the point of order, or else take his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not rule as yet that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is skilled in parliamentary law and I am paying him a compliment—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care to listen to any compliments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. I submit that the gentleman be permitted to proceed.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will leave out the name of the gentleman from New York if he does not like to hear his own name from my lips. I am astonished that any Member familiar with parliamentary law should state that an amendment fixing the time that an act should go into effect is out of order in a bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not astonished that the gentleman is astonished.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York should not interrupt the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that it is a legitimate part of the measure, that it does not create new law, that it is simply a limitation upon the bill being enacted, that it is germane, and under no conception is it subject to the point of order. I would like for the gentleman from New York to state the grounds for his point of order for the benefit of an intelligent membership, and under the general leave to print I will extend my remarks in the RECORD.

I wish to sound a note of warning to my Democratic colleague at the close of this bill. I realize that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will pronounce this another "attack" on the Democratic Party since it takes issue with his methods of procedure. The gentleman assumed that my remarks of yesterday were intended as an assault on himself. I could understand how he might have made such a mistake at the time of his remarks, but I notice in the RECORD of to-day that, in revising his remarks, when he was fully aware of my actual remarks and my real purpose, that he leaves his remarks as a personal assault on me, my Democracy, my patriotism, and my attention to duty in this House.

I am inclined to think that his original idea of my making an attack on him personally was due to the adroit injection of himself into the matter of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. This gentleman from New York does not seem satisfied with my compliment of yesterday, terming him adroit. I will now call him preeminently adroit. Adroitness is often a valuable thing to have, but in the gentleman from New York it is a dangerous thing for his comrades. In using this attribute yesterday he thought he would appear as defending the Democratic Party, and to-day he evidently thinks he appears in the same light; but I remember the day on the floor of this House, when the Democratic Party was in full array before the enemy at perhaps the greatest party crisis of recent years, and the gentleman from New York appeared on the scene as the standard bearer of the enemy and led to Democratic defeat.

But the gentleman from Virginia may have thought it easier to have his remarks on a personal plane than to try to justify his course as a Democrat, for he has brought the party into a position of danger—that of dealing with vital matters of national defense without proper deliberation. It is vain to say that there was a long period of general debate on the bill. The gentleman and all other gentlemen know that such general debate is not confined to the provisions of the bill, but extends to every subject under heaven. The gentleman also knows that often only the chairman and senior minority member of the committee remain regularly during this period, and only a handful of the membership is ever present, except on special occasions. The gentleman undertakes to comment on my not having been present during part of that time.

The gentleman will recall that I was present when he tried to foist this same legislation upon the Democratic caucus without its having even been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and he notes that I am present now; and he may expect to find me always present when he or anyone else undertakes to lead our party into danger. Before Caesar I will give due account of my attention to duty in my present office and in 18 years of prior service of record under the Government.

The gentleman refers disdainfully to the Chautauqua platform. I do not know if this is due to his never having had any call for his own services or to his having no message worth while to deliver. For my part, I am proud of the fact that on the Chautauqua platform and Lyceum platform my services are in constant demand, and that the message I feel I bear to the American people is gladly received by them.

It may be of interest to the gentleman to know that a part of my message which I carry far and wide relates to national defense, and no part of my message is received more earnestly by the American people than the part laying bare just such folly as the gentleman is guilty of—that of ignoring national peril and treating national defense as an adjunct of personal and party politics.

For the first time since I have been in Congress, probably for the first time since the oldest Member here can remember, we find politics carried into the committees on national defense. The gentleman from Virginia having failed to get his legislative measures, one of which provided for the advancement of The Adjutant General to the rank of lieutenant general, before the general caucus of the Democratic Party, did succeed, by the use of his position as chairman, in getting it before a caucus of the Democratic members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

I have never heard of a caucus being called inside the Naval Committee or the Committee on Military Affairs. It is not surprising, however, that the gentleman felt the need of caucus action for measures such as he advocated. Think of a proposition to make a lieutenant general, a rank higher than any rank that exists in the Army, for an officer who has spent the last 26 years of his life at a desk in Washington in a clerical and administrative capacity! We have created this exalted rank for officers of renown, who commanded armies successfully in the face of the enemy.

The true measure of the inwardness of the attitude of the gentleman from Virginia can be understood when we see the ruthless way in which he proposed to cut down the pay of enlisted men and officers serving under implied contracts in the sickness and exposure of the Tropics in the name of economy and at the same time proposed the astounding extravagance of giving the rank and pay of lieutenant general to bureaucrats. Even the leverage of the position of chairman and the sandbag method of committee caucus could not carry through the latter proposition, but the efforts of the gentleman from Virginia have succeeded in placing our party in the position of undertaking to reorganize the Army through riders on an appropriation bill.

It was bad enough to attach battleships to a pork barrel, but even that extraordinary precedent leaves the mind aghast at the present achievement.

I hereby again sound a note of warning to my Democratic colleagues. The instinct of self-preservation is the deepest instinct in the American people. Vital matters of national defense are not political matters; neither are they to be treated lightly by any party. The gentleman from Virginia not only questioned my politics, but my patriotism. There are some who look upon party ranks as a refuge of safety, useful chiefly for personal advantage in foraging. To me the ranks of a party is a place of service to the country. All parties should exist for the purpose of promoting the best interests of the country.

I am inherently a Democrat, because I believe in the people and trust the people; but I know the best foundation upon which to build a good Democrat, like the best foundation to build a good member of any other party, is to be a good American, first, last, and all the time. I realize full well that to be such a Democrat entails danger, not only danger from the enemy in front, but from an occasional ignorant comrade. I am now out on the picket line of an approaching battle of great consequence to the Democratic Party and to the country.

I am signaling a serious danger ahead, the most serious danger that has yet appeared, and while looking to the front am being sniped from the rear. But this danger shall not deter me, as it has not deterred me, from continuing the danger signal wherever I find it in the path of my party, or of subordinating party to country where duty makes the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 35 and consider the provisions in lines 15 to 19—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Was the point of order sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. MANN. To the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; and the gentleman from Virginia has been recognized.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late, as the gentleman from Virginia has been recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, you can not proceed in such a way—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is never disposed to cut anyone off from an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the Chair would not hesitate—

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois stated that he desired to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois did not take the floor when the Chair overruled the point of order. It is within the discretion of the Chair to determine whether the Chair desires to hear further argument on a point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will permit me to say a word. I stated several times to the Chair that I desired to be heard upon the point of order. The Chair stated to me the gentleman from Alabama had the floor. There was so much confusion in the Hall I did not even know the Chair had ruled upon the point of order.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The Chair said he was satisfied about his ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. This is exactly a statement of the situation. The Chair is mindful that the gentleman from Illinois indicated that he desired to be heard. The Chair overruled the point of order, and no request was made to the Chair for recognition for an appeal. Thereupon the gentleman from Virginia asked recognition, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MANN. Did the Chair overrule the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. While the Chair had no disposition to cut off anyone, there was no one else asking recognition after the Chair ruled and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Virginia. The Chair will say again that it is within the discretion of the Chair to decide whether he desires further discussion on a point of order. The Chair does not desire further discussion on this point of order.

Mr. MANN. The Chair does not need to repeat that. I understand the Chair now states he overruled the point of order, and a parliamentary inquiry—

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair stated that he overruled the point of order it was an inadvertence on his part.

Mr. MANN. Then the Chair has sustained the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair stated that the point of order was overruled that statement was an inadvertence. The Chair sustained the point of order—

Mr. HOBSON. I would respectfully request, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. After the Chair sustained the point of order, then without any haste on the part of the Chair and with no desire to cut off the gentleman from Alabama from an appeal, he not indicating that he desired an appeal, the Chair recognized the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN]. So far as the Chair is concerned he is perfectly willing for the committee to give unanimous consent to return to the gentleman from Alabama, and permit him to take an appeal to the committee, in fact the Chair would prefer that this should be done, and the Chair asks the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his request for recognition—

Mr. CARLIN. I withdraw it, at the request of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to the request that the gentleman withdraw it. If we are to be run by an autocratic Chair, very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman can withdraw his request without unanimous consent. The Chair does not understand objection can be made to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall object to any appeal—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] withdraws his request for recognition, and the gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair—

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is the regular order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. He is not before the committee, and—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MANN (continuing). There is nothing before the committee, and the gentleman can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOBSON. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can only proceed by unanimous consent, there being no proposition pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama was recognized to take an appeal from the point of order.

Mr. MANN. It was too late to take the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. HOBSON. I have no desire to either prolong the session or to make an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I call for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] does not desire to appeal, the regular order will be proceeded with.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to ask the Chairman if he would graciously state for my benefit or that of the membership the reason for his ruling?

Mr. MANN. There are no reasons. I ask—

The CHAIRMAN. I will put them in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I object to the Chair inserting anything of that kind in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the right to insert in the RECORD the reason for his ruling.

Mr. MANN. Not unless it was stated in the committee.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 35, so as to include the provision covered in lines 15 to 19, inclusive, as follows:

Provided, That $10,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended to macadamize the roadway upon the Government property between the United States Government experimental farm and the Arlington Military Cemetery, in the county of Alexandria, Va.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CARLIN. For the purpose of asking if this proviso is to be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of asking that the portion of the bill indicated by him be reinserted?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] asks unanimous consent to return to the portion of the bill indicated by him for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BURLESON. I object.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, before I move that the committee rise I ask unanimous consent to return to that portion of the bill where an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] which provided that the officers in the Cavalry should be transferred to the Infantry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, Engineer Corps, and Signal Corps. I do that for the purpose of amending that amendment so that these officers shall be only transferred to the Cavalry, Infantry, Field Artillery, and Coast Artillery.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to return to the portion of the bill indicated for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman wants to object, I have not anything more to say.

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HAY. What I want to do is to return to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] to the amendment offered by me in regard to the Cavalry.

Mr. MANN. I understand. What changes does the gentleman want to make?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman's amendment provided that these officers be transferred not only to the Coast Artillery and the Cavalry and Infantry, but the Engineer Corps and Signal Corps. I want to provide that they shall not be placed in the Engineer and Signal Corps. Otherwise, I shall be compelled to ask a separate vote on this amendment and ask that it be voted down.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, speaking only for myself, here are five regiments of Cavalry reduced. Those officers are to be—

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman wants to object, I hope he will object, and we will end it.

Mr. PRINCE. I want to see whether I understand it.

Mr. HAY. I withdraw my request.

I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and all the amendments thereto to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves the previous question on the bill and all the amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] to the amendment offered by myself with regard to the five Cavalry regiments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's request can not be separated from the amendment. The Clerk reports one amendment.

Mr. HAY. This was introduced as a separate paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I understand that. If the gentleman is correct, of course, that is all right. The gentleman himself offered the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, on page 1916 of the RECORD the following appears:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Add as a new paragraph:

"Provided further, That all officers of Cavalry made surplus by such reduction shall be transferred proportionately to the Infantry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, Engineer and Signal Corps, according to their relative commissioned personnel strength; and that the officers so transferred shall take rank in the branch to which transferred according to length of commissioned service: And provided further, That no officer shall be reduced in grade: Provided further, That there shall be no promotion from a lower to a higher grade in any branch of the military service until the officers in that grade shall have been reduced below the number now provided by law for that grade."

Mr. MANN. That is not the way it was offered, according to my understanding; but if that is the way it appears I have no question to make about it.

Mr. HAY. That is the way it was offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] demands a separate vote on the Anthony amendment. Is there a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. PRINCE. I demand a separate vote, Mr. Speaker, on the provision making a reduction in the number of regiments of Cavalry from 15 to 10, and also a separate vote on the provision making the term of enlistment in the Army five years instead of three years, as the law now provides.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of amendments dependent on the amendment abolishing the five regiments of Cavalry. I would not be willing to have those amendments adopted until we have a vote on the amendment of the gentleman in reference to the Cavalry regiments. I am perfectly willing to take a vote on this proposition first, and if that prevails, there will be no objection to agreeing to the other amendments en bloc.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a vote be first taken on the amendments indicated by myself and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

The SPEAKER. He indicated two amendments. Which one does the gentleman mean?

Mr. HAY. He indicated the five-year term of enlistment and the Cavalry amendment. I indicated the Anthony amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken, then, on the amendment reducing the Cavalry by five regiments. Is that the amendment?

Mr. HAY. That is the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] may be permitted to offer an amendment to the amendment on the Cavalry proposition such as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] be permitted to offer an amendment such as he desires to the amendment abolishing the five Cavalry regiments.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; to the amendment that was offered in committee by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

The SPEAKER. The Anthony amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I want to hear the amendment first. I may not object to it after I hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new paragraph:
"Provided further, That all officers of Cavalry made surplus by such reduction shall be transferred proportionately to the Cavalry, Infantry, Field Artillery, and Coast Artillery, according to their relative commissioned and personnel strength, and that the officers so transferred shall take rank in the branch to which transferred according to length of commissioned service."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question will be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] when we get the latter amendment.

Mr. HAY. I do not ask for a separate vote on it, though. As I understand, the amendment is agreed to by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] withdraws, as the Chair understands, his demand for a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. HAY. I do.

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have a report that I am anxious to send to the Public Printer at once, and I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to present it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to make a report, for the purpose of allowing it to go to the Public Printer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (No. 326), ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order on the bill.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House will resume consideration of the Army appropriation bill. The vote will first be taken on the amendment to abolish five regiments of Cavalry, which amendment the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, at the end of line 8, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1912, there shall be 10 regiments of Cavalry, and no more, in the United States Army, and that the officers who shall be rendered supernumerary by this reduction in the number of Cavalry regiments shall be retained in service and shall be assigned to vacancies in their respective grades as such vacancies shall occur in the Cavalry, or, in the discretion of the President, to such vacancies in their respective grades as shall occur in any other arm of the service."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 166, nays 112, answered "present" 10, not voting 104, as follows:

Mr. REDFIELD with Mr. J. M. C. SMITH.

Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. CARY.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio with Mr. JACKSON.

On this vote:

Mr. CULLOP with Mr. RODENBERG.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken on the remaining amendments in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to recommit the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to that committee to report that bill back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment:

Strike out of the bill the following:

"SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws authorizing increase of the pay of commissioned officers and enlisted men of the Army serving beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union, and the Territories of the United States contiguous thereto, are hereby repealed to the extent to which such increase of pay is authorized by such laws."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. PRINCE. And upon that motion, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRINCE (interrupting the roll). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in making the inquiry is this: I do not know whether the House knows what the effect of this motion will be. I ask unanimous consent—

The SPEAKER. The motion was reported from the desk.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the calling of the roll. The Clerk will proceed with the calling of the roll.

Mr. PRINCE. The reason I ask this is because there has been so much confusion.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 162, answered "present" 12, not voting 100, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi with Mr. CARY.

Until further notice:

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois with Mr. KOPP.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

Mr. DONOHUE with Mr. MCCREARY.

Mr. GARRETT with Mr. MILLER.

Mr. SMALL with Mr. POWERS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the amended bill.

The question was taken, and the amended bill was passed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend the title of the bill. After the word "thirteen" in the title insert the words "and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title by inserting after the word "thirteen," in the second line, the words "and for other purposes."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

A motion by Mr. HAY to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was, on his motion, laid on the table.

OMNIBUS WAR-CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19115.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19115, the omnibus war-claims bill, with Mr. SHACKLEFORD in the chair.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD assumed the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19115, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 9 of the bill and to offer an amendment to put in a finding of the court which was overlooked.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to page 9 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is a committee amendment?

Mr. SIMS. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. SIMS. It was left out inadvertently.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, after line 7, insert the following:
"To John W. Wallace, executor of the estate of Laura J. Dills, deceased, late of Jackson County, $2,945."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make a similar request, to return to page 15 to offer a committee amendment to put in a court finding that was inadvertently left out the same as the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, after line 13, insert:
"To Richard H. Turner, in his own right and as administrator of the estate of Eliza Turner, deceased, and Eliza Anne Turner, of Fayette County, $2,130."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the board of commissioners of the Judah Touro Almshouse fund, of New Orleans, $21,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have not called attention heretofore to the fact that the reading clerk has from the beginning of the reading of this bill skipped about half the words as read—

Mr. SIMS. Descriptive words only.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And I have no criticism to make of the reading clerk for doing that, because undoubtedly the reading clerk thought that was the practice of this body as it is in many legislative bodies. It never has been done during my service in this House, and I do not intend that it shall be done hereafter. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is now 10 minutes past 5 and that we have had a hard day.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea of going further than 5.30; of course, I know there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say, before he went into the committee, he expected to rise about 5 o'clock. We can finish the bill to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will make a point of no quorum, I would not proceed to get one. I concede there is no quorum here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have no trouble to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move, under the circumstances, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, February 17, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 17, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father Almighty, before whom millions bow in adoration day by day and receive that uplift of the spirit which enables them to fight valiantly and successfully the battles of life, so we bow in Thy presence praying for that baptism of the spirit which shall enable us to discern more clearly the way and do more faithfully the duties devolving upon us that we may fulfill the obligations resting upon us, now and always, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the business that is in order on Monday next may be transferred to Thursday. I wish to state to the House that I have an appointment that will take me out of town for a few hours on Thursday, and I do not care to be absent when the chemical bill is up. For that reason I would ask that the business that is in order on Monday be transferred to Thursday and that Thursday take the place of Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the business which will be in order next Monday shall be transferred to Thursday.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman when it is his intention to bring up the chemical schedule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If consent is given, it will be taken up on Monday for general debate, and I have no doubt that general debate will run all day Monday, and we will probably start on the five-minute rule on Tuesday.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. When was that bill introduced?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was introduced on Thursday, I think.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. When can we get a copy of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is in the folding room now—both the bill and the report.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. It is the intention to take that bill up and give us only a couple of days to become familiar with its provisions?

Mr. MANN. There is no settlement upon the time. This is a personal accommodation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As a rule, a tariff bill is taken up one or two days after it is reported to the House. This request will make it four days.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I do not want to object, as I understand it is a personal accommodation, but it does seem to me we ought to have more time in which to consider the great chemical schedule. The gentleman understands my position in the matter. I do not desire to vote blindly yes or no. I do not see how the membership of this House can become familiar with a bill of that kind in two or three days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman it has been customary with tariff bills to take them up immediately after they are reported to the House.

As a matter of fact, this bill was given publicity two days before it was reported to the caucus, and that is nearly a week ago. Not only that, but the caucus print was made public, with all the statistics of the Committee on Ways and Means attached to it, for the information of the House.

Mr. MANN. I think that is slightly exaggerated. I managed to secure a copy of the bill a few hours before the caucus was held on Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I gave it to the public press.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman did not call it to the attention of the House. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] did not know it was in the public press.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. No; we did not know it was in the public press.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the press said it was made public, and the gentleman probably overlooked it, as we naturally overlook many other things.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. I read on Wednesday morning that certain information, which was incorrect, was given out as to what the bill contained, and I got a copy. However, Mr. Speaker, we do not concede that the time allowed is sufficient to examine the details of the schedule covered by this bill, even if it be taken up on Tuesday. But the difference between Monday and Tuesday is not so great but that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accommodate the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand, if the House shall agree that Thursday shall be substituted for Monday, that that shall be considered as a limitation upon the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I merely asked that Monday be substituted instead of Thursday.

Mr. DALZELL. So that if the bill is discussed Monday and Tuesday and not finished it would go over until Saturday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; it would go over to Friday or Saturday.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If there is a desire on this side of the House to discuss the bill beyond Monday, is there any assurance that the bill will not be forced through on Tuesday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not withdraw his request. Wait a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] withdraws his request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is personal to me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should not be offended at a fair question. The question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is a fair question. I will say, for the benefit of gentlemen on this side of the House, that I have talked with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in reference to the matter, and he has assured me that, so far as fair consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule is concerned, he expects that this side of the House will have fair opportunity for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule. Of course we could not require or ask the gentleman from Alabama, in response to his request, to agree to unlimited debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama renew his request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not wish to make any issue out of this request. It is merely a substitute of one day for another day.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course the gentleman understands that if that were not substituted we would probably have to go over from Monday to Thursday. In consideration of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois to the effect that there will be fair opportunity for discussion and debate I will not object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not contemplated to deprive the House of opportunity for discussion and consideration. I intend to give—and always have tried to give on these bills—all reasonable debate under the five-minute rule, and I expect to do so in the case of this bill. But, of course, I do not expect to make any terms or limitations, so far as the conduct of the bill is concerned. I merely ask that Thursday be substituted for Monday.

Mr. Speaker, I renew the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to substitute Thursday for Monday in the transaction of business. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York rises to a question of personal privilege, which he will state.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the Army appropriation bill yesterday in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union an amendment, which appears on page 2140 of the RECORD, was offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] to which I interposed a point of order.

The House will recall that there was some discussion and some difficulty on the part of the gentleman from Alabama in submitting certain remarks that he desired to make upon that amendment. In order that the RECORD to-day may show exactly what transpired, I shall request that that portion of the discussion between the Chair and the gentleman from Alabama and myself be inserted in the RECORD, and I shall ask the Clerk to read, so as to save some of the time of the House, the portion of the remarks inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Alabama after he had been prevented from uttering them on the floor by the House, in so far as they apply to myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Page 2140.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 61, add as a new section the following":

"SEC. 10. That the provisions of this act shall not take effect before January 1, 1915."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order—that it is new legislation.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will say that unless the chairman of the committee accepts the amendment providing that these officers and men may have opportunity to adjust themselves to these changed conditions, I shall not press it, either as to the point of order or as to the amendment itself.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it can be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not believe it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will employ the time at my disposal simply to conclude the statement of my position on this whole matter. I suppose that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will say that I am making an attack upon the Democratic Party. As this bill is closing, I simply desire to lay before my colleagues in the Democratic Party that it is in my judgment the most imperative duty of our party to give due and careful consideration—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, what is before the committee?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I make the point of order to the amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, I wish to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to have the gentleman lecture the Democratic Party.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing this measure. I expected the gentleman from New York to rise. He is exceedingly adroit—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Then I shall discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule, as a matter of course, that the gentleman must speak to the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman must not discuss anything else.

Mr. HOBSON. I will remark, in connection with the gentleman's adroitness—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman discussing anything except the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is offered in very good faith. I have seen adroitness in the matter of amendments employed on many sides, and I can remember one time when the gentleman from New York was lined up with the enemy—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If that point of order is insisted upon, the gentleman must proceed in order.

Mr. HOBSON. I will now move an amendment to my amendment, to strike out the last word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I insist on the regular order.

Mr. HOBSON. Then I will discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is whether the gentleman's amendment is in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized to speak to his point of order.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. When the question of good order is being discussed, is it improper to mention the name of the Democratic Party?

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOBSON. If bad order were being discussed, we could very well mention the Republican Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized to discuss the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from New York—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman confine himself to a discussion of the point of order, or else take his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not rule as yet that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is skilled in parliamentary law and I am paying him a compliment—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care to listen to any compliments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. I submit that the gentleman be permitted to proceed.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will leave out the name of the gentleman from New York if he does not like to hear his own name from my lips. I am astonished that any Member familiar with parliamentary law should state that an amendment fixing the time that an act should go into effect is out of order in a bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not astonished that the gentleman is astonished.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York should not interrupt the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that it is a legitimate part of the measure, that it does not create new law, that it is simply a limitation upon the bill being enacted, that it is germane, and under no conception is it subject to the point of order. I would like for the gentleman from New York to state the grounds for his point of order for the benefit of an intelligent membership, and under the general leave to print I will extend my remarks in the RECORD.

I wish to sound a note of warning to my Democratic colleague at the close of this bill. I realize that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will pronounce this another "attack" on the Democratic Party since it takes issue with his methods of procedure. The gentleman assumed that my remarks of yesterday were intended as an assault on himself. I could understand how he might have made such a mistake at the time of his remarks, but I notice in the RECORD to-day that, in revising his remarks, when he was fully aware of my actual remarks and my real purpose, that he leaves his remarks as a personal assault on me, my Democracy, my patriotism, and my attention to duty in this House.

I am inclined to think that his original idea of my making an attack on him personally was due to the adroit injection of himself into the matter of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. This gentleman from New York does not seem satisfied with my compliment of yesterday, terming him adroit. I will now call him preeminently adroit. Adroitness is often a valuable thing to have, but in the gentleman from New York it is a dangerous thing for his comrades. In using this attribute yesterday he thought he would appear as defending the Democratic Party, and to-day he evidently thinks he appears in the same light; but I remember the day on the floor of this House, when the Democratic Party was in full array before the enemy at perhaps the greatest party crisis of recent years, and the gentleman from New York appeared on the scene as the standard bearer of the enemy and led to Democratic defeat.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I telephoned the office of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] this morning for the purpose of requesting him to be present in the House. I was informed that he had left the city last night and probably would not return before a week from next Monday. In the same remarks inserted in the RECORD the gentleman from Alabama has this paragraph:

The gentleman—

Referring, however, to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]— refers disdainfully to the Chautauqua platform. I do not know if this is due to his never having had any call for his own services or to his having no message worth while to deliver. For my part, I am proud of the fact that on the Chautauqua platform and Lyceum platform my services are in constant demand, and that the message I feel I bear to the American people is gladly received by them.

I have never—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of personal privilege?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has inserted matter under what he presumes to be a leave to print, but which is, in the form in which he has inserted it, a breach of the privileges of the House. The statement refers to myself in some respects, and I wish to give it some attention. As the gentleman could not utter it on the floor, and perhaps would not have uttered it on the floor, I do not propose that anybody shall insert covertly into the RECORD any statement affecting my official conduct in the House without having at least some brief attention paid to it. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can move to strike it out of the RECORD, or he can ask unanimous consent to address the House. I do not see how it is a question of personal privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to strike it out of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I concede the gentleman's point. It does not involve a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be a bad precedent.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York will ask unanimous consent—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If it were necessary, the Chair would rule that the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is well taken. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in my 13 years of service in this House I have never felt it necessary to take the time of the House on a matter which I believed to involve a question of privilege. I have been, perhaps, as severely and as unjustly attacked for my actions in this House as any man who has ever served in it. Yet if I did not feel that those whom I represent knew me sufficiently well to know that in whatever way I acted in this House I had been actuated by a high sense of duty, I would not care to continue my service in it. So long as I am a Member of the House, however, I feel an obligation to remain here and to attend to my duties as a representative of the district from which I come. [Applause.] No matter how important a message I may have in my own mind to deliver to the people of the country, I believe I can more effectively deliver that message and more faithfully discharge the duties devolving upon me as a representative of the people by staying here and, in my humble way, doing the drudgery of the work of the House day in and day out, rather than to take the compensation given me under the law as a representative of the people and go out to deliver messages at a price paid by outside persons. [Applause.] The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] came to this House from the Chautauqua circuit and delivered an assault upon the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] during the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. He criticized the "railroading" of the bill through the House and his inability to obtain time in which to discuss important features in it, although the bill had been under discussion here for two weeks, and had he been here attending to his duties as a Representative, and not chasing the phantoms to whom he was attempting to deliver some imaginary message on behalf of the American people, he could have delivered what he had to say here for the information and enlightenment of his colleagues. To the credit of this House let it be said that the House has not the same high opinion of the value of his statements as he seems to have of them, and it gives the attention to them that he should expect when they are delivered in the manner in which they are to the House.

He charged conspiracy on the part of certain Members of the House in obtaining information in an improper manner and entering into combinations for the purpose of influencing legislation, and, like many men in similar positions, he assumed that he was possessed of all the patriotism of the House, and assumed to warn his party colleagues not to imperil the country or the national defense.

Mr. Speaker, I have much more confidence in gentlemen who spend here not only the winter months, but also the hot summer days, in this House in an honest attempt to frame legislation which will result beneficially to the country than I have for the off-hand opinions of gentlemen possessed of the notion that they possess some message which must be delivered to the people through the Chautauqua platform to the neglect of duties they are called upon to perform by the people. [Laughter and applause.]

I have nothing whatever to say of the gentleman's reference to my attitude on a former occasion. I differed with my colleagues on a question of what should be done in the matter of changes of the rules. I had honest convictions on that question. I had the advantage of the gentleman from Alabama in that situation, and in many others, in that I possessed information which justified me in acting upon my own conviction, which in many cases he does not. [Applause.] I submitted that question to the people of my district. The campaign was fought against me upon it. The results were satisfactory to me, however much they were displeasing to my opponents, because my majority was increased 4,000 in the campaign in which that issue was fought out. I never charged my party associates with improper motives or with a desire to accomplish legislation in an improper way. I have given every man the benefit of the belief that he is actuated by a desire to discharge properly and honestly the duties of his office. Mr. Speaker, if the practice indulged in by the gentleman from Alabama is to be adopted in this House there could not be much order in the transaction of the business of the House.

The gentleman from Alabama attempted to make statements on the floor on an amendment which was not in order, and which, in the exercise of my rights under the rules, I prevented from being made, and then, under a presumed leave to print, he undertakes to insert in the RECORD statements about myself, and much more severe and indefensible statements about the gentleman from Virginia.

Under the rules of the House the two columns of the RECORD which he inserted may properly be stricken out, but I prefer to leave them there. They will not hurt me in any place, and they will serve as an illustration of the type and character of the gentleman who, in an underhand and covert manner, resorted to this means of reflecting upon his colleagues.

I only regret, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Alabama is not present, because if he were I would not feel the same restraint that I do in submitting these observations to the House.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit me a question, I would like to ask if the gentleman from Alabama has gone to meet the Japanese, or to talk on the Chautauqua platform? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, those elected to this House for the purpose of representing districts who choose to engage in some other occupation to the neglect of their duties should be very careful not to reflect on other Members of the House who feel that it is their duty to remain here at some sacrifice, and at times with great discomfort, to discharge the public duties for which they are elected. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have read from the Clerk's desk certain remarks interpolated into the RECORD by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] and that I may say a few words in regard thereto.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that certain excerpts from the RECORD may be read from the Clerk's desk, and that he be permitted to make a few remarks on the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the first time since I have been in Congress, probably for the first time since the oldest Member here can remember, we find politics carried into the committees on national defense. The gentleman from Virginia having failed to get his legislative measures, one of which provided for the advancement of The Adjutant General to the rank of Lieutenant general, before the general caucus of the Democratic Party, did succeed, by the use of his position as chairman, in getting it before a caucus of the Democratic members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The true measure of the inwardness of the attitude of the gentleman from Virginia can be understood when we see the ruthless way in which he proposed to cut down the pay of enlisted men and officers serving under implied contracts in the sickness and exposure of the Tropics in the name of economy and at the same time proposed the astounding extravagance of giving the rank and pay of lieutenant general to bureaucrats. Even the leverage of the position of chairman and the sandbag method of committee caucus could not carry through the latter proposition, but the efforts of the gentleman from Virginia have succeeded in placing our party in the position of undertaking to reorganize the Army through riders on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] is not present, so that I might characterize this covert attack as it deserves. I would not take it up in his absence did I not think it due to myself, as well as to the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, to repel the insinuations which the gentleman from Alabama has made. These remarks resulted because I declined to revise the remarks that I had made on a previous day in response to a speech and an attack directed at me by the gentleman from Alabama. I want to say now that these remarks, inserted in the RECORD in a covert way, in a way to which no man would resort if he had the frankness of spirit which a man should have, are false insinuations without basis or foundation in fact, and in the name of the Committee on Military Affairs and in my own name I repel and repudiate them.

The gentleman's reference to a Democratic caucus and to the fact that I was unable to get this bill before it is an insinuation which every member of that caucus knows to be untrue. They know that that bill was not taken up because they declined at that time to take up any measure of any sort, and that the merits of the bill were not gone into by that caucus in any way. The statement that there was a caucus in the sense of there being any meeting of the majority members of the Committee on Military Affairs to bind them to vote for any provision in this bill is absolutely without any foundation in fact. I had the right, which I exercised, to consult with my colleagues on that committee with regard to legislation pending before it; and if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] would consult more with his Democratic colleagues he would appear more as a Democrat on this floor than he now does. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that no effort has been made by me to unduly advance the fortunes of any man, and I am here to avow that anything I placed in that bill when it came before the House or before it came before the House could have been justified by me, and I stand ready to meet any responsible criticism from any responsible party, made in any fair, frank, and honest manner. [Applause.]

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit from the Committee on Rules a privileged resolution (H. Res. 411) respecting banking and currency conditions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the day before yesterday we made a unanimous-consent agreement in the House that the omnibus war-claims bill should continue to-day until it was finished, if it should be finished to-day. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] made a request at that time, in which he said:

Mr. Speaker, the Army appropriation bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not finished. To-morrow is private-claims day, and it was my intention to ask for the further consideration of what is known as the omnibus war-claims bill, but I have agreed with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, providing we can get unanimous consent of the House to do so, that this bill—may be finished to-morrow and then that the war-claims bill be taken up immediately after this bill is finished, provided it is finished before the day is over, and also be proceeded with during Saturday or until it is finished, if finished on Saturday.

It is true that the Chair put the request that the omnibus war-claims bill should be in order to-day; but I think the understanding in the House at the time was that we were giving unanimous consent that the war-claims bill should be gotten out of the way if possible on yesterday and to-day, and that it had a privilege as against any other thing that should come up in the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that while that agreement may have been entered into, it was not to the exclusion of a privileged report or a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. The understanding in the House is that a unanimous-consent agreement was binding, and the understanding in the House at the time clearly was that the omnibus war-claims bill should be proceeded with to-day if it was not finished yesterday. A unanimous-consent agreement can not be, among gentlemen, revoked by a matter of privilege.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, permit me to add that the Committee on Rules could have made this report on Friday, when the war-claims bill would come up under the general rules, and when it would have been itself highly privileged.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that my emphatic purpose was to have this made a special continuing order, provided it did not go beyond to-day. It was so understood by everybody in the House, and while the Chair did not repeat the exact words I used, the words I used are correctly reported, and that was that this bill should be taken up and considered until finished, if it required all day to finish it. It is a unanimous-consent order, and it seems to me to be as binding and explicit as a request could be made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if unanimous-consent agreements in the House are not to be respected, I am sure they will not be entered into hereafter.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why, we will be out of the way in 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. We will not get through the war claims bill in three months if this unanimous-consent agreement is not respected.

If the gentleman wants to run over a unanimous-consent agreement, he need not ask for any more from this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement was that the War Claims Committee should have this day, and so rules. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the resolution and give notice that I shall call it up immediately after consideration of this bill, provided there is sufficient time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Texas. He says he will offer his resolution again as soon as this bill is through. Could we not have an understanding that it will not be offered to-day?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; I think I will have to take it up the first opportunity.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the gentleman intend to proceed if we get through with this bill at 4 or 5 o'clock?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

OMNIBUS WAR-CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19115, and, pending that motion, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks that he may make a request, and I am willing to withhold my motion until the gentleman can make it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent for three minutes in order to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] [laughter and applause] offered an amendment to the pending bill. The effect of his amendment was to fix the year 1915 as the date at which the bill should take effect. A point of order was directed to that amendment and the point of order was sustained. The gentleman from Alabama asked the Chair to give the reasons for the ruling. The committee was in some disorder at the time, and was evidently impatient to proceed with the disposition of the pending bill, and the Chair stated that the reasons would be put in the RECORD. I wish now to give those reasons. The amendment provides, as has been stated, for a postponement of the date at which the bill should take effect and is in the following terms:

SEC. 10—

A new section—

That the provisions of this act shall not take effect before January 1, 1915.

The law provides another and different date at which otherwise the act would take effect. "By the Constitution of the United States, the very time of the approval of a public law, constitutes the time as to when the law is to have its effect." (20 Federal Cases, case No. 11777.) The amendment, therefore, clearly provides another date. But for the amendment as soon as the President approves the bill the bulk of the retrenching provisions would go into immediate operation. Under the amendment these provisions will not begin to operate as a whole until January 1, 1915, though the President might approve the bill in the next 60 days. The amendment certainly does not retrench expenditures, since its chief and obvious purpose is to postpone the time at which the operation of these benefits shall begin. Hence the amendment does not come within the exceptions of the second section of Rule XXI, while it does change the effect of existing law. For these manifest and obvious reasons the Chair sustained the point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, and, in conformity with the statement of the Chair to the gentleman from Alabama, it is now desired to put in the RECORD the reasons for the ruling.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia, who has just taken his seat and who was in the chair on the Army appropriation bill, having made a ruling yesterday absolutely indefensible from every point of view, and having refused an opportunity to gentlemen on the floor of the House to submit arguments on the point of order, after a delay of some hours has manufactured an excuse which may seem good to him, but which has no foundation in fact. There is no law providing when an Army appropriation bill shall take effect. The Army appropriation bill or any other bill which has been passed by the House, unless otherwise provided, takes effect when it is approved by the President. The bill provides what year the appropriation shall be, and to rule that the House when it passes a bill can not insert in the bill a provision stating when the law shall take effect is absurd on its face [applause on the Republican side] and ought never to have been so ruled by the Chair. It is for the House to judge whether an amendment is absurd that may be offered, not for the Chair to judge, and if any amendment was in order at any time fixing the time when the law shall take effect even an absurd amendment that it should not take effect for a hundred years would be in order, though it might not be adopted by a sensible body.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman stated that without any statement in the bill an appropriation bill would take effect when approved by the President?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then would not any provision fixing the time when the legislation should take effect be under the rule new legislation and subject to the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Not at all; it is legislation to say it takes effect immediately; that is legislation—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but it takes—

Mr. MANN. And it is no more legislation to say it shall take effect 30 days from now or 60 days from now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It takes effect immediately under the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A provision in a bill to fix the time when an appropriation bill shall take effect is legislation within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. MANN. It does not take effect under the Constitution at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it does.

Mr. MANN. It takes effect by virtue of the language of the bill. The law puts itself into effect under the provisions of the Constitution, and the law that puts itself into effect when it is approved can at the same time carry a provision that it shall not go into effect for, say, 10 days or 10 years, leaving it to the judgment of the body which passes the law to determine.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am willing to leave the matter on the statement of the gentleman.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19115. The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19115, making appropriation for the payment of certain claims in accordance with the finding of the Court of Claims, etc., with Mr. SHACKLEFORD in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to page 27 of the bill in order to offer an amendment, as follows:

Insert, after line 3, page 27, the following:

"To Charles P. Cammack, Mary B. Earbin, Lillie V. Oldham, and Frances H. Glover, heirs of Mary R. Cammack, deceased, late of Jefferson County, $525."

The reason this is not in here is that I did not have the findings in my hands at the time the bill was made up, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] called my attention to it and furnishes the findings, which is exactly in accordance with the findings of all claims in this bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent to return to the page mentioned in order to offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to page 27 of the bill in order to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have order and then have a statement of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 3, page 27, the following:

"To Charles P. Cammack, Mary B. Earbin, Lillie V. Oldham, and Frances H. Glover, heirs of Mary R. Cammack, deceased, late of Jefferson County, $525."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the findings of the facts of the Court of Claims are as follows and sufficiently explain the nature of the claim:

I. Claimants' decedent, Mary R. Cammack, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the late Civil War.

II. During said war the military forces of the United States by proper authority, for the use of the Army, took from claimants' decedent, in Jefferson County, Ky., property of the kind and character described in the petition, which at the time and place of taking was reasonably worth the sum of five hundred and twenty-five dollars ($525), no part of which appears to have been paid.

III. The claim herein was never presented to any officer or department of the Government prior to its presentation to Congress and reference to this court by resolution of the United States Senate, as hereinbefore set forth in the statement of the case, and no reason is adduced showing why the same was not earlier presented.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim herein is an equitable one in the sense that the United States received the benefit of the supplies for which claim is made.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Louis Benecke, of Chariton County, one thousand seven thousand and sixty-three dollars.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, on lines 18 and 19, page 58, it reads:

To Louis Benecke, of Chariton County, one thousand seven thousand and sixty-three dollars.

The second word, "thousand," in line 19 is a typographical error and should read "hundred." I move, on page 58, line 19, to strike out the word "thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 19, strike out the word "thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To William B. Payne, late a resident of Cass County, $4,754.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to insert the findings of the court in the case of Phelps County, Mo., for $890, which was left out by inadvertence. I offer it as a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 61, amend by adding after line 14 the following paragraph: "To Phelps County, Mo., $890."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas to make a statement.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee that it has been arranged for House resolution 411 to go over until Monday at the convening of the House, and it will be the first business taken up on Monday. That is the resolution to investigate the so-called Money Trust.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Daniel K. Ponder, of Ripley County, $530.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last evening I submitted an observation on the practice of the reading clerk in reference to skipping a part of the bill. Possibly the observation was a little more stringent than I intended it to be. It is sometimes convenient not to read all the language of a bill—inadvertently—and, so far as I am concerned, the purpose for which I made the observation having been accomplished, I would be very glad to have the Clerk read only the names and amounts. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To the trustees of the Christian Church of Warsaw, $660.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the bottom of page 63 add a new paragraph as follows:

"To the trustees of the Presbyterian Church and the trustees of the Masonic Hall at Platte City, Mo., $3,500."

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I am well aware that it will meet with opposition from the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, but I trust it will not meet with opposition from the membership of the Committee of the Whole.

This is a claim that was passed upon by the Court of Claims in 1896 and allowed, and the following language appears in the report made to the Senate of the United States in the Fifty-ninth Congress:

During the said war for the suppression of the rebellion the military forces of the Union, by proper authority and for military purposes, took possession of the buildings and furniture belonging to the claimant and totally destroyed the same, which at the time and place were reasonably worth three thousand five hundred dollars ($3,500), no part of which appears to have been paid.

Now, I gather from the report of the committee on the bill now pending that this bill does not include all the claims passed upon favorably by the Court of Claims, but I draw the inference from the report that all claims that have been passed upon favorably and reported back to the Senate or to the House ought to be paid because they have been so reported. The committee says in their report that the Court of Claims rejected a vast number of claims and allowed only those that should be paid.

The facts about this particular claim are these: During the war the troops took possession of the Presbyterian Church of Platte City. Over the church was a Masonic hall. The troops occupied the building for barracks, and during the time of occupation it took fire and was destroyed. I do not suppose it was purposely set on fire during the time the troops were occupying it, but the fact is that it took fire and was burned. If it was purposely set on fire it would be wanton destruction of property.

These are the facts upon which the Court of Claims based its findings. I presented this claim. It was originally presented long before my time in Congress. The Senator who presented it and had it referred to the Court of Claims had long since passed out of public service. I took up this claim and presented it to the committee, which committee refused to place it upon this bill, not because it was an unjust claim. The Committee on War Claims of the House did not turn it down because it ought not to be paid, but for the simple reason that as the report was made to the Senate the claim ought to go to the Senate and be put on there. That, in my judgment, is not a good reason for rejecting this claim in this bill.

Another objection that I have heard raised here and that, I presume, will be raised to this claim, is the statement in this report that the property was utterly destroyed and that the Government does not pay for property that was destroyed. That at one time might have been the rule of this House; that at one time might have been the rule laid down by Congress and followed by the courts; but in the Sixtieth Congress this House and the Senate changed that rule and made a rule, which was stated upon the floor of this House, which was that they would not only pay for property that was occupied and destroyed at the time of occupation, but that they would pay for the wanton destruction of property.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did they pay for any such property?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. The bill was defeated.

Mr. BOOHER. No; it was not defeated. I refer to the Philippine bill, and that was not defeated.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I did not vote for the Philippine bill, but I would not admit that the gentleman's argument was properly based upon the provisions of that Philippine bill.

Mr. BOOHER. My argument is based upon statements made by Members upon this floor when that bill was pending, and by Members on that side, at least one of whom, Mr. CRUMPACKER, of Indiana, stands high, not only as a Member of this House, but as a lawyer. He said if it was not the law it ought to be the law to pay claims of this character; and I want to say to this side of the House that they can not afford to change the rule and refuse to pay to the people of our own country what they paid to the people of a foreign country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to say that the Committee on Insular Affairs, in the Sixtieth Congress, reported a bill to pay for damages to church and school property in the Philippine Islands. A commission had been appointed by the then Secretary of War who is now President, Mr. Taft, consisting of three high Army officers, to go about the Philippine Islands and assess the damages to property. They did that and reported damages to the amount, in round numbers, of $363,000, and connected with that was a report of $40,000 for property wantonly destroyed.

The Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, when that report was sent to this House, recommended that not only the $363,000 be paid, but that the $40,000 be paid, and this House voted to accept his recommendation and to pay not only for property that was occupied and destroyed while in occupation, but for the wanton destruction of property. In other words, they paid not only for property used, occupied, and destroyed, but for property stolen from these churches and schools. Congress has established the precedent, and I say it would be wrong now to change that rule as against the people of our own country. Let me read some of the debate that took place at that time. Mr. Gaines, of West Virginia, who is not now a Member of the House, said:

I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether it is the practice of this House to allow damages for the wanton destruction of property in churches during the Civil War?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is the rule everywhere that where the Government takes control or possession of a property for its use, it becomes responsible for the custody and care of the property.

That is the ordinary legal obligation of a tenant, and if it commits waste it is responsible under the law for the damages that it either commits or suffers to the property. The Fifty-fifth Congress allowed a claim of $288,000 for occupancy and injury to property during the Civil War.

Mr. HARDY. I have only a little to say. It has been objected to the amount fixed by the committee that it includes wanton damages, and the objection is on the ground that wanton damages are never allowed for. I conceive that if the United States Government takes possession of private property and places its soldiery in that property, and the soldiery commits wanton injury, it is right and just that the United States should pay for it, and if that kind of damage has not been paid in cases before for other churches or for other buildings, it ought to have been paid.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is exactly the principle that the committee pursued in estimating the amount that should be paid in this claim.

Mr. HARDY. I think the committee did right.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not disputing the proposition he lays down, that when the Government does put its soldiers into a church, and they commit wanton waste, the Government ought to pay. I am not so much objecting to having the principle extended as I am objecting to having it extended in the Philippines and denied in West Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, I am standing here to object to this doctrine being applied in the Philippine Islands and refused its application in the State of Missouri for the same kind of loss and damage, and I call upon this House now to treat the people of this country, the people of Missouri, Texas, and Tennessee, and other States who had property destroyed, which has been passed upon by the Court of Claims and decided that the claim was just, the same as it is treating the Philippine Islands, and that these claims be made a part of this bill.

I know the people of the community where this claim originated. I have talked with them about the claim and I know how it occurred. There was no place for barracks for the troops. It was stormy weather in the fall of the year, and these men took possession of the Presbyterian Church and the Masonic hall above it; they occupied it as barracks; and during the time that they occupied it it caught fire and was destroyed, whether purposely set on fire or not I do not know.

Now, I am told that it is a legal claim, but that I must go to the Senate of the United States to have it put on. I appeal to this committee that if it is a legal claim it should be placed in the bill. The claimants here are as justly entitled as were the churches of the Philippine Islands, and we can not afford to treat the people of that far-off island better than we treat our own people.

This property was taken possession of by competent military authority. The colonel in command of that regiment ordered it taken possession of. It was taken with all of the furniture—not very much, of course, but all that they had. All the furniture in the Masonic hall was taken and used by the soldiers, and, as I said, all of the furniture, together with the building, was destroyed. Now, I have the law laid down by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. Gaines, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], while we were considering the Philippine bill, that it was the rule that they applied in making up the bill in that case. Mr. Chairman, I submit again to this House that this is a just and fair claim and ought to be made a part of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] makes a fair statement about his case. He did write a letter to me, and one was sent to him with my signature to it, affixed by a stamp. There was no intention to mislead the gentleman. As a general rule, the War Claims Committee has not, I believe, in making up the bill, included claims that were based on Senate findings. We do not like to do so, as a rule, because the Senator who introduces the bill and sends it to the Court of Claims, we presume, wants the credit of it. I had stated to the Clerk that when Senate findings were sent in to send them back and ask them to put it on in the Senate, and that is the way this letter was written. But after having examined the bill, which passed the House in the Sixtieth Congress, and finding a number of Senate findings, on inquiry I believed that to include all of the claims of the Senate and the House would not exceed the limit that I thought we could get the bill through, I gave directions to put them in.

Now, I should have no hesitation whatever; I would move it as a committee amendment to put this claim in if it was not contrary to the law as we have it and every rule we have had in the making up of claims.

I have in mind what the gentleman said about the debates about the Philippine case, and I refer to it in my report. My recollection is that I voted against the bill.

The facts in this case which the gentleman from Missouri read did not include the third finding. If the gentleman read it, I did not catch it. The third finding is:

It appears from the evidence that the said property was destroyed in the belligerent prosecution of the said War of the Rebellion.

The Committee on War Claims, since I have been a member of it, nearly 14 years, has never reported a bill of that kind where destruction was the result of belligerent warlike operations.

Mr. BOOHER. What is the meaning that the gentleman puts on the word "belligerent"?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman knows the meaning of that word as well as I do.

Mr. BOOHER. As used in this connection.

Mr. SIMS. I read the language of the court. I would be glad to have every burned or destroyed building in this country paid for, so far as I am concerned, but the law referring these cases to the Court of Claims provides:

That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of or damage to property by the Army or Navy, or any part of the Army or Navy, engaged in the suppression of the rebellion from the commencement to the close thereof.

I stated in general debate, and I will repeat it now, that the measure of damages is reversed in these cases, that it is the measure of benefit to the Government, and not injury to the claimant. That is the rule and that is the law. However you and I as individuals might differ as to that matter, the Government pays, or is supposed to pay, only for benefits received. So, where a church is torn down and the material used, it pays only for the value of the material to the Army. There has been some relaxation of that rule in some cases I admit. There have been some cases of payment for property actually destroyed. The cases were cited in general debate, but this case is clearly a case of destruction and in the belligerent prosecution of the war.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] a moment ago asked the gentleman from Tennessee what he meant by the word "belligerent."

Mr. SIMS. I quoted the language of the court.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I presume that means in prosecuting the war?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I can very well understand how the Federal Government might destroy property owned by a citizen in order to weaken the forces opposed to the Federal Government, but the United States Government can hardly claim, I think, that it was going around destroying church buildings in order to overcome a section of the country or a number of citizens of the country. As I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], he says that the building was occupied, and while being occupied caught fire and burned. The gentleman from Tennessee has just read from section 3. I desire to ask him if the committee and the House are bound irretrievably, without any hope of escape, by the findings made by the Court of Claims?

Mr. SIMS. This bill is to pay for claims based upon court findings where four things concur: First, loyalty of the claimant, which, of course, does not apply to churches; second, the taking of the property; third, the value of the same; and, fourth, nonpayment.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. All of those things appear there, do they not?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. What is short?

Mr. SIMS. The very item read by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER]—

During the said war for the suppression of the rebellion the military forces of the United States, by proper authority, for military purposes, took possession of the buildings and furniture belonging to the claimant and totally destroyed the same, which at the time and place were reasonably worth the sum of $3,500, no part of which appears to have been paid.

There is not an item in the finding of the court that indicates that this House was incidentally, accidentally, or unintentionally burned.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does it not appear inferentially, at least, that they took possession of it for the purpose of using it as a hospital or camp?

Mr. SIMS. If this was a claim for use, and use were proved, we could pay it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If they took it for the purpose of using it, they did not take it for the purpose of destroying it, and if destruction is an instrument of use, it seems to me that Congress ought to pay.

Mr. SIMS. But the finding of the court is against the reasoning of the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I know one paragraph conflicts with the other. This is not the first time that I have seen findings from the court that are contradictory. Sometimes I forget to put on the brakes when I begin to talk about these courts—Federal courts—but I am not so enamored of the findings as some gentlemen are. I take it that sufficient appears there to justify Congress in paying for that house.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with everything that has been said. Tennessee, my own State, was a battle field from one end to the other. That State, perhaps, would get more benefit by reversing the law than any other State in the Union, because we had nearly everything burned and destroyed in the way of churches, colleges, and buildings of that kind. We had a larger number of loyal citizens than almost any other Southern State. But I am compelled, as chairman of the committee, to stand on the laws of the country and the rules of the House. I have no other motive than to be consistent and to live up to the rules of the committee and the law of the land.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. To relieve the gentleman of any anxiety on that score, I want to say that in looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it appears to me that through the activities of the gentleman from Tennessee, whom I am now addressing, together with those of his colleague [Mr. AUSTIN] on the other side, every valid claim of any citizen from Tennessee has already been presented and paid.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, not a drop in the bucket.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this is not a case for sympathy. I have had sympathy enough about this claim, and I am now presenting it for payment, and I am asking Congress to pay it. Why, I can take the gentleman's report, and I can prove to the satisfaction of this House, if not to him, that he quotes with approval the act of Congress paying claims in the Philippine Islands—

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. BOOHER. And here is one now that has a great deal more merit and a great deal more equity in it than any claim that we have had in the Philippine Islands when we destroyed property there. Now, the gentleman says we do not pay for property where it is taken in the act of a belligerent prosecution of war. Now, what is a belligerent prosecution of war? I tried to get the gentleman to tell us the proper meaning of that word as used in this connection, and he did not do it; but he smiled and said it meant "belligerent," that is all. Now, there was a regiment of soldiers ordered through the State of Missouri—as much a border State during that terrible war as any other State—and this property was destroyed, as I have already stated. Those soldiers were gathered there under a regular order, with no other place to go except in the court-house and church buildings of the city of Platt City. There was not a shot fired—if that is what the gentleman means by belligerency—there was not a gun fired, but they were encamped and rested there, and during the time they were occupying this building it took fire, as I stated before, and was destroyed.

Now, the gentleman says that because it was destroyed it ought not to be paid for. If the soldiers of the United States Army had not occupied the property of these people, it would not have been destroyed, at least at that time; and I want to state again to the gentleman that he probably gave the true solution why this claim was not put in the bill when he said that they concluded they would get the bill about so large and it would go through the House and they would put certain Senate claims on it. Now, this claim happened to come, I suppose, after the amount which was to go into the bill was reached, and consequently it must go back to the Senator who introduced the bill, who was one of the most honored Senators of the United States and has years and years ago passed to his reward. Now, of the two Senators who were there at the time this claim was reported one is dead and the other is out of the service. Because this claim happened to be introduced by a Senator who is dead years ago, is a Member who is called upon by his constituency who owned this property to be denied the privilege of coming before a committee of this House and presenting a claim to this House, or does it have to be sent back to the Senator who introduced the bill? Gentlemen, that may be the rule, but it will not have my sanction during the time I am here. I believe a Member of Congress has a right to represent the people of his district before any committee [applause], whether the original bill was introduced in the Senate or in this House, and I propose to follow it up and to stand here and urge and demand that this Congress treat the people of this country just as fairly and just as honestly and with as much equity as you before have treated the people of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that the Committee on Claims adopted any such rule as has been suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, to wit, that claims based upon Senate references should not be inserted during the preparation of a House bill. If any such rule was adopted and followed I would like to know from somebody on the committee. I know that if such a rule was adopted it was not followed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there was not a formal rule adopted; it was what you might say a rule of conduct of the committee, because in several Congresses the chairman of the committee who was then on the opposite side had been notified or had agreed that the bill should not exceed a certain amount.

Mr. BOOHER. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, to say they first adopted the rule that they would not put in any Senate reports and then they afterwards determined they would keep the bill within a certain limit, and they then notified the Clerk to put on certain Senate reports until it came up to that amount.

Mr. SIMS. I did not mean a formal rule of the committee—

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman stated that it was a rule, but I am willing to take his statement that it was not a formal rule, but it had the same effect, and I stated it correctly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, during the special session of Congress, after the committee had been appointed, I discussed the question of the omnibus war-claims bill with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims], the chairman of the committee, and with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Morse], the ranking Republican on the committee. I stated to both of those gentlemen that, in my judgment, at least, the policy that was formerly pursued of including in the war claims bills that were introduced in the House only claims based upon House references, and leaving to the Senate to insert as amendments all claims based upon Senate references, was unfair to the House, both to the membership individually and collectively; that when such a policy was pursued it took away a proper advantage to individual Members of the House who were looking after the interests of their constituents and, besides that, left the conferees representing the House, if the bill ever got into conference, without knowledge concerning the Senate amendments, except such knowledge as they might collect after the amendments had been passed in the Senate or perhaps the conferees appointed, and that I never would consent, so far as I was able to prevent, to the passage of an omnibus war-claims bill in the House based upon the old method of making it up; but that if the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Wisconsin and the other members of the committee would give consideration individually to these various findings, based both upon House and Senate references, so that the committee or the members took the responsibility of saying that after an examination of the findings in the case there appeared to be just reason for the payment of the claim, I would use every effort within my power to expedite the passage of the bill in the House and to make it a law in the end. I made somewhat the same statement the other day when the bill was up in the House. Now, I am surprised to hear a reiteration, a statement from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Booher], that this bill is not based upon a consideration of all the findings of the Court of Claims, and selecting meritorious findings regardless of whether they were referred by the Senate or the House, but that a rule was adopted to have only House findings included. If I were convinced of that fact it would take considerable time to pass this bill.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. I was basing my statement on the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims]. He stated that the first rule of the committee was that they would only take claims that were reported back to the House. They afterwards concluded they could take Senate claims and still keep bills within the limit. I based my statement on what the chairman of the committee said, and I do not think I should be subject to criticism for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to state that when they first commenced correspondence in regard to these claims his secretary sent out a formal letter, following the old custom, signed with a stamp, stating that Senate findings or references would be considered in the Senate.

Mr. BOOHER. I got no such letter.

Mr. MANN. That was the letter that I supposed the gentleman received.

Mr. BOOHER. No; here is the letter that I received. I will read it to the House if I get the time.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about the merits of this amendment. If it shall be the policy of Congress to pay claims for the destruction of property during the Civil War, we had better commence to find, not one but forty new methods for raising revenue. There is no distinction between this case that I can discover and hundreds of thousands of other cases where the Union Army destroyed property in the conduct of the war. No one contends, not even the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Booher], that a man who rents a building as a tenant is liable for the value of the building if it is destroyed by fire. And yet that is his contention in reference to these church buildings in this town in Missouri. There is no assurance on the part of the occupant that the building will not be destroyed, even if it were not destroyed by an act of war, but the finding of the court here is, in effect, that the buildings were destroyed as an act of war, and if we are to undertake the payment of all those claims—if we are to commence by setting a precedent and paying one we will have to undertake the payment of all of them, and there is no treasury in any nation that can stand it. I do not think we ought to commence.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] yield to his colleague [Mr. Fowler]?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I will be glad to have the gentleman explain, if he knows, whether there has been any discrimination made between property taken and wantonly destroyed and property taken and accidentally destroyed.

Mr. MANN. I am not able to inform the gentleman.

In this case the question is determined by the court, in effect, that it was destroyed as an act of war.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. I understand that the gentleman lays down a principle of law that he does not want to stand upon. Does the gentleman mean to say that if a tenant wantonly destroys the house he is occupying he is not liable?

Mr. MANN. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. BOOHER. There are certain cases in which he would not be liable, but there are certainly other cases in which he would be.

Mr. MANN. I have not heard anything concerning this case which differentiates it from the mere occupation by a tenant where the loss of the property occurs through destruction by fire. There is nothing in this case to differentiate it from that. We can not undertake to pay all these claims against the Government. We are now considering the payment of French spoliation claims more than 100 years old. We are asked to take up the consideration of claims for payment to the heirs of George Washington which are over 100 years old, and to take up the consideration of claims in every direction, claims that are not hoary with age but bald with age [laughter], and yet gentlemen assume that when they start a precedent in this House it will apply only to a particular claim. You can not pass a claim of this sort without involving the Government in enormous expenditures.

The gentleman cites the Philippine claims which were paid. Well, I was not in favor of the payment of the Philippine claims. If the gentleman had quoted in his speech the remarks—and they were short—which I made when the Philippine claims bill was under consideration, he would have discovered the reason why the bill was passed.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman quote them? I remember very well what they were, but the gentleman did not have any influence with his side of the House in making them. I wish the gentleman would put in the Record his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think I had influence enough to kill part of that bill, and did kill part of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman just a moment ago made a distinction between claims that were hoary with age and claims that were bald with age. The gentleman from Tennessee would like to know the difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Tennessee does not know the difference I will never be able to inform him, I fear.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall not have to explain this matter again, but I do not want to have any misunderstanding of it. The letter written to the gentleman from Missouri was signed by a stamp. I never saw it, and I did not know he had received it until after we took up this bill for consideration. But I do know how it came about. It is dated January 18, and reads:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912.

Mr. CHARLES F. BOOHER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My DEAR SIR: I return herewith letter of Mr. Hopkins and Senate finding in the case of Trustees of Presbyterian Church and Masonic Hall, Platte City, Mo., with the suggestion that you have one of your Senators arrange for the insertion of this case in the so-called omnibus bill when it gets to the Senate.

Very truly, yours,

T. W. SIMS, M. C.

It is signed by a rubber stamp.

Mr. MANN. What is the date of it?

Mr. SIMS. January 18 of this year.

Now I will refer to another matter which had a bearing, or which I thought had a bearing, on this subject. But, before I forget it, I want to refer to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. If he said anything to me during the extra session about the matter, I have no recollection of it; but since the present session began—I was gone in the month of December—he did make the statement to Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin and myself, as he stated, and as I notified some Members that we were not going to put in the Senate findings, I immediately sought every Senate finding I could find coming within the rule. Now, if I had written this letter and had seen the finding—of course, I do not know whether or not the finding was present before the clerk when the letter was written—

Mr. BOOHER. I would state to the gentleman that it was.

Mr. SIMS. But if I had had the finding before me I would have stated that we could not include that finding within the omnibus bill.

Now, the Committee on War Claims has a rule, section 5 of rule 2, which provides that we will not consider any bill or claim in which no attempt has been made to collect the claim prior to the 1st day of January, 1900. I found Senate references which had been made since that date, and up to a late date, and I thought our rule ought to preclude us from favorably reporting a Senate bill that was sent to the court in violation of our rule. But after studying the matter over, the claims having been sent there by a body that had the power and right to do so, and the persons having been put to the expense of proving up their cases, I thought we ought to put them in. I say now that I would move to insert this claim, if the mere fact that it was a Senate reference was all that stood in the way. But waiving all that, I am opposing this amendment simply because it is not of a class that we could report. Not even as a separate bill standing on its own merits could the Committee on War Claims report it favorably, according to the precedents of the committee. Of course we have the power to do it, and Congress has the power to pay it. It is not unconstitutional or anything of that sort; but there has been no intention on my part to mislead or deceive anybody, and it is a very hard matter to frame an omnibus bill containing more than a thousand items and get it through the House, if anybody wants to defeat it. With over a thousand items in the bill, how easy it is, without any attempt to filibuster, to take up all the time allotted and prevent the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOOHER. I want the gentleman to understand that I do not intend to filibuster and defeat his bill.

Mr. SIMS. I know that.

Mr. BOOHER. I am trying to secure the payment of a just claim, but I do not want to have any suggestion made that I am going to filibuster against the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I am not making that suggestion.

Mr. BOOHER. If I can not get this claim paid, which I am presenting in good faith, if the Committee of the Whole decides against me, I am not going to filibuster against other people getting what is coming to them. I do not do business in that way.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about me. I expect to do that. I do not deny it at all.

Mr. SIMS. I know the statement of the gentleman from Missouri to be perfectly correct. In making up an omnibus bill there must be some general rules to govern the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Tennessee have two minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I wish the gentleman would restate what he said about not considering any claims that were not presented before 1890.

Mr. SIMS. Before January 1, 1900.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask what the gentleman means by that?

Mr. SIMS. I will state, as I did in the debate before, that when no effort was made to collect a claim through the Southern Claims Commission, through the War Department, by suit in the Court of Claims, or by a private bill prior to January 1, 1900, it is an absolute rule of the committee that we will not report a bill favorably to pay any such claim. In other words, it is so late that it is nearly impossible to prove such a claim by any evidence now in existence, and we thought the fact that no effort had been made to collect a claim for 30 years after the war was over was good evidence that there might be something wrong about the claim.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Would the gentleman consider the introduction of a bill as an effort to collect the claim?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes; that is an effort to collect it.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. If the proof was as conclusive now as it could have been 20 or 30 years ago, would the gentleman still insist upon that?

Mr. SIMS. If it was documentary evidence, or something of that sort, it would be a different thing; but we must have a general rule. Consequently, the Committee on War Claims adopted that rule, that where no effort was made to collect a claim prior to January 1, 1900, the Committee on War Claims will not favorably report a bill to the House.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. How long has that rule been in force in the committee?

Mr. SIMS. I think, since 1900. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Mahon, was chairman of the committee that adopted that rule.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the Committee on War Claims may have three minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want any more time. I ask for a vote.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. SIMS. Very well. Let the gentleman ask his question, and then I shall have to move to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know if it is the policy of Congress not to allow claims for property destroyed during the Civil War?

Mr. SIMS. That is the law of the United States.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask if there has ever been a distinction made between property which was wantonly destroyed and that which was accidentally destroyed?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, there have been two or three, perhaps five or six, cases of claims allowed by Congress by special act where property was destroyed. I do not remember whether it was accidental or intentional destruction, but the rule I have stated so often that it is not necessary to repeat is that the Government pays for the benefits received and not claims for damages. No benefit was received by the Government by the burning or destruction of this property.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that the property was taken charge of by the Army and used for its own benefit, and that during the use of the property it was intentionally or wantonly destroyed by fire.

Mr. SIMS. The court finding has been read.

Mr. FOWLER. One more question. I desire to know if it is the policy of this committee and of Congress not to allow any claims whatever where the property was simply destroyed and not used by the Federal authorities during the war?

Mr. SIMS. That is the law, and until Congress repeals its own law it is bound by it.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand from what the gentleman said that by special act there have been some claims allowed?

Mr. SIMS. By special appropriation.

Mr. FOWLER. Did they come in in the way of a general bill from your committee, like this?

Mr. SIMS. No; these are commissary stores and supplies. There is nothing in here for the destruction of property.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the use of this property ever been paid or accounted for by the Government?

Mr. SIMS. I have no knowledge of it, and there are no findings of the court on that question.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand there is a finding here, and it includes both the use and the destruction of the property.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will read the court findings, the gentleman from Illinois will see what the court has said about it.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the contention on the part of the claimant, is it not?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to ask any further question?

Mr. FOWLER. The Government took possession of it, and the court finds that the Government both used and destroyed it, and that is what the claim is asked for.

Mr. SIMS. I do not question that.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know as I understand the rule that the gentleman spoke of in regard to claims having been presented since 1900. There have been some claims, have there not, submitted since 1900?

Mr. SIMS. By resolution of the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. And I think by the House.

Mr. MANN. There were a lot of them, but they were claims that had been pending.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; they were claims that were pending.

Mr. RUSSELL. Those submitted by the Senate since 1900, if the court should make a favorable report, would not be barred by any rule of the committee or the House?

Mr. SIMS. Not by this body; I do not know what the Senate might do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOOHER) there were 20 ayes and 32 noes.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Webster, $450.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 22, page 114, insert the following:

"To the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Glenville, W. Va., for use and occupation of church property during the Civil War, $500."

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the amendment which I have offered is for compensation to this church for the use of its property, which, I understand, will not be objected to, either by the chairman of the committee or by the minority leader [Mr. MANN]. I will state in this connection that I have the findings of the Court of Claims, which show that this property was both used and destroyed, and they report the value of the property at $800. I will say that I have drawn this amendment so that, if it be adopted, it will not create a precedent against what I understand to be the views of the chairman of this committee; and while I am not able to show the gentleman the actual rental value of this property by this finding, because it does not separate it, yet I take it this House of Representatives and this Congress will not inquire too closely into the rental value of the property which was taken by the Government for its own use and which has never been returned to the owners. I do not think that we can afford to go upon record here as saying that this claim should be wholly rejected because the Court of Claims has failed to distinguish between the actual value of the property and its rental value. In looking over this bill I have found that there are something like 500 cases where churches have been allowed something. I take it that the bill is consistent. I know that the chairman of this committee is discharging his full duty in this matter. I have no criticism for him, but, on the contrary, only the highest compliments to bestow upon him when he discharges his duty in this House. Now, out of these 500 claims there are perhaps not one of them that has less than $500, and I take it that a bill drawn upon the lines of consistency gives to these churches an average of $500 for use and occupation. Now, from that fact, I think we have the right to draw an inference here that the rental value of this property and its good to the Government was as much, at least, as the average of these other churches, and certainly $500 is far below the average. I think the contention that the benefits to be derived by the Government shall govern our action is not entirely an inflexible rule. I have a case of this kind—not pending before this committee at present, but in the Court of Claims—where the claim arose from the erection of fortifications upon a man's farm. For something like a half a mile upon the brow of a hill they took up his farm and threw up fortifications. The farm property might be worth $1,000—at least this land taken might be worth that—but the benefit to the Government is untold, because these fortifications held back the advancing army of the South, and it never passed them; so if you are going to put it upon the ground of benefit to the Government it would seem to be an inconsistent rule, because the advantage to the Government was perhaps a thousand times as much as the total worth of the farm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the findings in this case are as follows:

1. The Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Glenville, W. Va., as a church was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the late Civil War.

That is all right.

2. During the war for the suppression of the rebellion the military forces of the United States, in the winter of 1862-63, took possession of said church property and used the same as a storehouse for military supplies for a short period. During the time the building was so occupied the building was burned and destroyed, but by whom and for what purpose the same does not appear. The reasonable value of the church building at the time of its destruction as aforesaid was about $800.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the court had found that the use and occupation for the time used was $800, or any other sum, I should not have opposed the appropriation for that amount, but this is clearly a finding of the value of the church, and it shows that it was destroyed during the occupation, but the finding does not even say by whom. It might have been done by the Confederates; it might have been done by the Federals; but if destroyed by the Federals, then there could be no valid claim for destruction. I am sorry the court has not specifically found a sum for use and occupation.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. And if I had the court findings in that regard, I would not oppose it at all, Mr. Chairman; but as it is, we can not assume that the amount found as value was for use and occupation when the findings specifically fix the amount here as the value of the property destroyed. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. You will admit the average allowed to churches for use and occupation in this bill is at least $500?

Mr. SIMS. I have not looked that up. If there was a finding of the court to show what it was, I would be in favor of putting it in.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. I have no doubt, as I said before, that the chairman has endeavored to do what is right in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In this bill there is carried less than a thousand dollars for persons residing in the State of Wisconsin. In that connection I want to say a word concerning the work done by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the ranking Republican on this committee [Mr. MORSE]. The gentleman from Wisconsin was asked by me to give special attention to the items which might go to make up this bill, and time and time again the gentleman, in discussing with me the items which might go into this bill, or rather in referring to them, has led me to know that he was burning midnight oil in studying the court findings on a measure of great importance to many Members of the House, but of no importance to him or his State.

It often happens in this House that the gentlemen who do the hardest work are not seen or heard in connection with that work, though I think as a rule that when a Member keeps on doing the work that falls to him in the course of time, if he remains here long enough, an opportunity comes when he will probably be the only man in the House well informed upon some subject of great interest that everyone else wants to know about. And the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has done this drudgery work uncomplainingly, because it fell to his lot in the assignment of committees, is entitled to receive great credit from this House and from his constituency and from the country for the work he has so well performed. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I heartily approve every word that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said with reference to the labors of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], and I am a witness as I was a co-worker with him. I know what he says is true. [Applause.] Now, I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that every member of the Committee on War Claims during the Sixty-second Congress has discharged every duty that has been placed upon him faithfully, conscientiously, ably, and efficiently. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads the amendment I ask unanimous consent to make a statement for a moment. The amendment is very long, and I think I ought to state that it contains a list of the French spoliation claims which passed the Senate in the last Congress. All of these claims have been adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and for that reason it seems to me a proper amendment to offer at this time. But as there may be some question about that, I do not wish to detain the committee to read so long an amendment unless the Chair rules it is in order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want it read unless it is in order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, then. The point of order is this, that this committee has no jurisdiction over the French spoliation claims. The Bowman and Tucker Acts do not relate to them.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to have a ruling on that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. WEEKS. Paragraph 702 of the rules of the House of Representatives provides that claims arising from any war in which the United States has been engaged shall be referred to the Committee on War Claims. I claim that these spoliation claims arose from the French War or as a direct result of the French War, and therefore should have been referred to the Committee on War Claims instead of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask my friend right there if it was war between the United States and any other country?

Mr. WEEKS. My recollection is that war was not declared against France, but a state of hostilities existed and these spoliation claims arose as a result of this condition, the destruction being largely the work of privateers for which letters had been issued by the French Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the French spoliation claims arose out of the treaty of 1803, and never have been considered in this House since I have been here as a subject matter of reference to the Committee on War Claims, but have always gone to the Committee on Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding that the Chair has of it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. That in case of the death of any claimant, or the death or discharge of the executor or administrator of any claimant herein named, payment of such claim shall be made to the legal representatives: Provided, That where a claimant is dead the administrator, executor, or legal representative shall file a certified copy of his bond, which bond must be at least equal in amount to the sum hereby appropriated, except that where the claim grows out of service rendered the United States in the Army or Navy and the payment to be made under this act is less than $500, and the person who rendered the service is dead, and no demand is presented by a duly appointed legal representative of his estate, payment may be made to the decedent's widow or legal heirs as is provided by existing laws relating to the settlement of accounts of deceased officers or enlisted men of the Army and Navy (34 Stat. L., 759; 35 Stat. L., 373): Provided further, That in all cases where the original claimants were adjudicated bankrupts payment shall be made to the next of kin instead of to the assignees in bankruptcy: And provided further, That wherever under this act it is provided that a payment be made to an executor or an administrator, whether original or ancillary or de bonis non, and such executor or administrator is dead or no longer holds his office, payment shall be made to the successor therein, his title to hold such office being established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and wherever under this bill it is provided that a payment be made to a corporation or quasi corporation and such corporation or quasi corporation has been merged in or consolidated with another corporation or quasi corporation, payment shall be made to the corporation or quasi corporation with which the consolidation or merger has been made.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 17, page 116, the following: Provided, That no part of the sum or sums so appropriated to pay any claim herein shall be paid to the claimant, or his heirs, assigns, or personal representatives, until he or they shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States an affidavit which shall state that no sum in excess of 25 per cent of said claim will be paid by the claimant to any attorney at law, attorney in fact, agent, or claim agent as compensation for prosecuting said claim.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment. I do not know that it is subject to it, but I reserve the point.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say to the committee that I have another amendment here which I desire to offer as a separate section, after the present amendment is voted on. The amendment I offer at present, however, goes directly to the appropriation and the application of the money appropriated by the present section.

Now, I realize that we are about to close the consideration of this bill and that the members of the committee are anxious to conclude the day and the week's work. But, gentlemen, I think that this amendment is of vital importance, not only to the consideration of the claims included in the present bill, but in the consideration of all claims of this character, and of all claims of all characters presented against the Government of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Fully sympathizing with the purpose of the gentleman, I would like to ask him what would happen in a case like this: Here is one of these claimants, of discretionary years, who has made a contract with an attorney to pay him 30 per cent in accordance with the laws of his State. Would that claimant be able to recover any of the money that we provide for in this bill?

Mr. JACKSON. I will answer the gentleman's question. I was just about coming to that. I think I can satisfy the gentleman on that point, and I am obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion. I was going to say before I came to that point that I would like the gentlemen of the committee to understand that I am in entire sympathy with this legislation. I think I can also truthfully say now that upon no other class of claims representing this amount of money would I be willing to stand here, representing the people of the district which I have the honor to represent, and vote for such an amount of money to go out of the Treasury of the United States. I do not say this because I mean in any way to suggest offering reward for the treatment which the southern soldiers or the southern people have accorded to the Union soldiers in the granting of pensions, but I say it, gentlemen, because I want, so far as I am able, to vote in this House to the effect that we have a new Nation, indeed, since the many brave and stalwart young men of the South offered their lives and poured out their blood in defense of the flag, and that the flag represents something which means toleration and fraternity and loyalty throughout the entire country. And so I am glad to have this opportunity to vote for any class of claims which give something to the people who suffered some special hardship on account of the Civil War.

While that is true, I realize that all of the claims which go through Congress, which are the subject of appropriations, reflect, on account of the baneful practice of the attorney, upon Members of this House in a certain degree, and without offering some protest I am unwilling to stand here and vote for claims which mean the enrichment of an attorney or a certain class or firm of attorneys.

Now, in reply to the gentleman's question, it is suggested here that perhaps the effect of this amendment might be to abrogate contracts previously made. I think we have ample power to do that where we have evidence, as we must have, that contracts have been forced from people, when under other conditions such contracts would not have been made. There is no fairness in contracts when there is absolute helplessness on one side and comfort and financial power on the other side. I have in my possession now a letter from a holder of one of these claims, who says that he has refused for years to submit his claim to the attorneys who have been prosecuting and collecting claims of this class, because they refuse to take his claim for less than 50 per cent of the amount of the principal.

Just a word more. There sits upon the floor of this House to-day a Member who, if he happens to be present at this moment, will substantiate my statement, who related to me his experience in getting through a claim of this kind. He said he worked hard here on behalf of some man, because he thought that man had a meritorious claim. The man wanted $5,000. After seven or eight years of hard work that Member succeeded in getting the claimant allowed $2,800. Then he was informed by an attorney, who had never done a stroke of work to help the claimant, that he claimed 33½ per cent of the amount that the Government, through the efforts of this Member of Congress, had been induced to grant to this man.

Mr. GARRETT. Was that a war claim?

Mr. JACKSON. I am not able to state; but, as I said in the beginning, I think this principle applies to all claims against the Government.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman is aware, of course, that the law expressly prevents Members of the House or Senate going into the Court of Claims.

Mr. JACKSON. I understand that. I did not mean to consider that point at all. I am simply considering the fact that this man got this money through the efforts largely of individual Members of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am in perfect sympathy with this amendment, if it can be accomplished; but suppose contracts have been made with attorneys to pay them 30, 35, 40, or sometimes in a case of small claims, even as much as 50 per cent. If this amendment is passed, before any sum can be paid to the claimant he must sign an affidavit that not more than 25 per cent of the money received by him will be paid to an attorney.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is all right if it can be done. But suppose the claimant does that and does violate his contract, will not the contracting attorney go into the civil courts and sue the claimant for the balance of that money? Is there any power in us to set aside that contract?

Mr. JACKSON. I think there is. That is the question I was trying to answer. It seems to me the effect of this amendment would be to absolutely abrogate the contract if we declare the contract to be absolutely invalid. And while this House may not want to pass a law that would directly do that, it does it in effect, and no court would entertain a suit to collect upon that contract.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. JACKSON. Because this House has said, as a condition of this appropriation, that the claimant shall not pay more than that sum.

Mr. MANN. That is not what the gentleman's amendment is.

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, the condition of this appropriation is that it shall stay in the Treasury until this man files that affidavit.

Mr. SIMS. What affidavit?

Mr. JACKSON. The affidavit provided for here.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman state the substance of it?

Mr. JACKSON. That the claimant will not pay more than 25 per cent of the amount for the attorney's fee.

Mr. SIMS. How is he going to swear that, when he has already signed a power of attorney giving 33½ per cent?

Mr. JACKSON. Why, I see nothing to prevent him, if this House says that it will not make this appropriation on the condition that these contracts, which were frequently made to pay these attorneys' fees, are to be validated. In other words, we stand here and say we will not be a party to the enforcement of those oppressive contracts.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The proposition the gentleman has made is all right if it could be made workable; but the gentleman's attention has been called to the fact that this proposition, in the present form, is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The filing of an affidavit by a man who had entered into a lawful contract would not relieve him from the obligation of his contract. It might make it impossible for him to get his money. Would not it be possible to frame an amendment in a form requiring the attorney to file an affidavit or a release relinquishing all but 25 per cent?

Mr. JACKSON. I have no objection to such an amendment. But I want to say before I close that these men have no claims for attorneys' fees under the contracts until this House makes the appropriation to pay the claim. If this House attaches a condition that no claim shall be paid and no money shall be turned over to the claimant except upon the condition that no part of the money above 25 per cent shall go to an attorney, then that condition to the appropriation is absolutely valid, and it abrogates the contract.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL. Would the gentleman be willing to have his amendment modified so that it would provide that appropriations were herein made upon the condition that no more than 25 per cent should be paid to counsel?

Mr. JACKSON. That is what my amendment does state.

Mr. McCALL. The gentleman's amendment provides that the claimant shall file an affidavit.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I will.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman's amendment provide simply for the payment of fees, or advanced costs? In many instances the attorney has advanced considerable sums in costs to bring witnesses to Washington, for example, and the gentleman also knows that every one of these claims has been prosecuted before the Court of Claims by attorneys. The gentleman understands that?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The provision in the gentleman's amendment is utterly impossible to apply to this bill.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, I know what the gentleman means. I understand that it is proper for the claimant to have an attorney before the Pension Department and other departments, but it often happens that the careful attention that is given to these claims by Members of this House and Members of the other body is what results in benefit to the claimant and not the technical work done by the attorney. I am willing that the attorneys shall have adequate compensation for their work, but I am not willing that they shall stand here and hold up this House and put Members of this House in the situation of having voted a fortune to them for the purpose of doing a little bit of justice to somebody else.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman if he contemplates allowing these men attorney fees or fees and advanced costs?

Mr. JACKSON. The amendment says attorney fees, and beyond that I am not in favor of anybody taking a claim against the Government and advancing costs for the purpose of encouraging litigation against the Government. I think it ought to be prohibited by absolute statute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas does not undertake at all to say what the attorneys' fees shall be. All his amendment does is to provide that money shall not be paid to claimants unless the claimant files an affidavit that he will not pay more than 25 per cent as compensation. How can a claimant file an affidavit stating how much he will pay for compensation, or that he will not pay more than 25 per cent, if he has made a valid contract, enforceable under the laws of the State, providing that he will pay 30 per cent? The effect of the amendment would only be to prevent claimants receiving any money at all. That we have the power to do.

Now, if the gentleman from Kansas, or any other gentleman, desires to meet the situation, it is quite within the power of Congress to make a penalty against an attorney for taking more than 25 per cent, regardless of any contract that may have been entered into. We have a right to make it a misdemeanor for an attorney to take more than a certain percentage of the money that we appropriate to spend upon a claim. But when you undertake nominally to punish the attorney, but, in fact, to punish the claimant, that is the wrong way to go about it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Kansas. I have no doubt of the good motive of the gentleman from Kansas. That is, he does not want, as he calls it, Congress held up by a lot of attorneys for unconscionable and unjust fees for services performed when the appropriation comes from the Treasury. But I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] that I have had long experience in this matter, and if he will look at this bill which has just been considered, with its one thousand and seventy or eighty claims, he will find that a great number of them are for very small amounts. In each case the claimant undoubtedly has a contract made with persons sui juris, except in a few cases where the claim is represented by an administrator; and I want to say if he will investigate the work done in these cases he will agree that he would not himself to-day take claims for $1,000 or less to collect against the Government upon a contingent fee for the sum that he provides in his amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. What proportion of these claims allowed by the present bill, if the gentleman knows, is represented by one attorney or one firm of attorneys?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know, as I said in general debate.

Mr. JACKSON. Does not the gentleman know of this practice—

Mr. SIMS. But I want to say to the gentleman that as far as my knowledge goes, it is getting next to impossible now to get an attorney to represent these claims on a contingent fee of less than 33½ per cent. Let me say to the gentleman that of all the claims sent to the Court of Claims not over 10 per cent of the amount claimed is allowed by that court. The gentleman does not count anything for the hundreds and thousands of claims in which the attorney performs the service where no amount is allowed at all. True, we should not make the successful pay for the unsuccessful, but the amount of these fees on these small claims for the work done is nothing more than reasonable and honest when you count all the work done in connection with all of these claims that go to the Court of Claims, and that go there by order of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe, from his experience with these claims, that 25 per cent of a claim is a reasonable fee for any work done by an attorney?

Mr. SIMS. On all of these Civil War claims below the amount of $1,000 I think 33½ per cent is as small a fee as you can get the work done for. As I say, an attorney must take them all or none, and when you consider the entire service rendered and the compensation received, I want to say to the gentleman that these attorneys are not walking down Broadway with their pockets stuffed with ill-gotten gains.

Mr. JACKSON. Does not the gentleman know from his own experience, and does he not believe from his own experience, that these claims below $1,000 are prosecuted with larger claims, and in that way only?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, as a matter of course, an attorney who takes a small claim also takes a large one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. While an attorney takes claims large and small, each claim is a separate individual service and has no connection with any other. There can be no omnibus suit in a Court of Claims. Furthermore, the service is already rendered in these cases, and rendered under contract, and it would be just as dishonorable to violate that contract as it is for an attorney, as the gentleman says, to force men to make the contracts.

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks any considerable number of these men would have contracted to have paid the sums for attorneys' fees which they have contracted to pay if they had not been forced to do so?

Mr. SIMS. Forced! Simply because nobody would take the case for any less.

Mr. JACKSON. And why?

Mr. SIMS. Because it does not pay to do so. If it did, there would be numerous attorneys, and they would compete one with the other. I do not want to be misunderstood. Let the gentleman prepare a bill and introduce it, and if it is sent to the committee over which I have the honor to preside I shall be glad to report the bill favorably if it provides against contracts in the future for unreasonable fees; but after the service has been rendered upon contracts executed, to comply with which it is nothing but just and honest, I for one will oppose the gentleman's amendment, although I do not oppose the thought and idea that prompts it. There is no use of sending claims to the Court of Claims if we provide a compensation for prosecuting them that will not be accepted.

What will be the result? Does the gentleman know what pressure will be brought upon Congress to make direct appropriations without ever going to a court, and a practice will grow up here of paying claims by direct appropriations, with nobody to say anything in regard to them except the committee and the House? Now, with 300 or 400 Members interested in reporting bills here for claims upon which no court has passed, I would say to the gentleman from Kansas that we had better let them go to the Court of Claims, better let them employ their attorneys at reasonable fees, for the sake of the Treasury. Besides—

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman will permit, and is it not a fact that the committee on these claims have no power to bring witnesses before them and put them under oath in order to get the evidence?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, a committee can not take the place of a court; it is utterly impossible to do so.

Mr. JACKSON. It is true, if the gentleman will pardon me, that the work that is done before the Court of Claims is largely clerical; that is, in cases where testimony is taken.

Mr. SIMS. Testimony has often to be taken in the neighborhood where the claimant lives.

Mr. JACKSON. But it is done by deposition.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will only look at this pile of findings I have here on my desk, he will see that in every case, without the exception of one, the amount of the claims is perhaps two or three times the amount which the court allows.

Mr. JACKSON. That may be true.

Mr. SIMS. I am perfectly willing to support a bill that hereafter contracts shall be regulated as to fees. It is logical that there should be a difference in fee between a small claim and a large claim.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me. I would like to offer it before his statement. I will not speak on the amendment, but will let the gentleman have the floor. I desire to add to the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the amendment the following: "Provided further, That all contracts heretofore made providing for a larger fee than 25 per cent are hereby declared to be null and void as to the amount in excess of 25 per cent."

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the end sought to be gained by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas. I am not in sympathy with the lack of frankness that he exhibited in answering my question. The fact is this amendment does not provide for a limitation of attorneys' fees to 25 per cent. I would like to vote for an amendment which will do that if I can do so without compelling these people to violate the contracts into which they have already entered.

Mr. JACKSON. You mean as to future claims?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. As to future claims, and I am not sure I would not vote as to these particular claims here. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman apparently wants to accomplish, but the gentleman will not accomplish that at all.

Mr. JACKSON. Let me ask the gentleman if the amendment now offered to the amendment by the gentleman from Nebraska will not take out all question concerning the validity of past contracts? I thought it did in the first place, and certainly with the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, making all of these contracts void as to this appropriation, that question is taken out.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think that many Members of this House do not recognize the fact that you can not prosecute these claims without evidence. I think many Members do not realize that these claims come from a long distance from Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Just let me finish this thought. Now, you have got to get the evidence—and many claims are from very poor people that have not a dollar with which to get their evidence—and get it here, and in many instances they have to bring their witnesses here. They have to do that in certain cases. Now, I do not object to an attorney paying these witness fees, which he is permitted to do now under the law, and if it were not so these people, who are poor, could not collect where the wealthy could collect, and therefore I am much opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, because in many instances more than 25 per cent has been advanced by the attorneys in necessary expenses.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, if it is not true that these claims, as a matter of fact, are prosecuted almost by the wholesale, and that there are a whole lot of claims depending upon one particular set of facts that must be established?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the amendment, the objection which he offers to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas would apply to expenses that are not properly included in attorneys' fees.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. But the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas does not include that.

Mr. NORRIS. In his amendment?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood that it applied to attorneys' fees.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. He says that no sum shall be paid to attorneys.

Mr. NORRIS. As attorneys' fees?

Mr. JACKSON. It says "as compensation." [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move a pro forma amendment to say very briefly that, in my judgment, where a contract has been made under existing law it can not be invalidated by legislation. However, I hope the Committee on the Judiciary, or some appropriate committee, will report a bill to fix fees on a graduated scale in suits against the Government for recovery. Many scandals have grown out of such matters, especially in the West. I believe that the attorney is worthy of his fee, but I would like to know, after all is said and done, that the claimant, many times helpless, has not been imposed upon and that the Government has not been imposed upon. For years I have been troubled in my own mind as to what could be done toward collection of claims against the Government. There is no statute of limitations that will run against legislation for payment of claims.

It is quite a common saying throughout the country that "the United States is the poorest paymaster on earth." That is not true. The United States, where it agrees to pay, where the law provides for payment for services performed, is the best paymaster on earth. There have been many instances, however, when claims come crowding in, as they did directly after the close of the Civil War, where men absolutely gave their receipts for large amounts of money in full payment of all claims, but, nevertheless, by subsequent legislation large additional amounts were paid, notwithstanding the previous full payment and receipt therefor.

You may say, "What are we going to do about it?" Nothing, practically, can be done about it, as I see it, except by the enactment of legislation that will graduate the fees according to the amount recovered. In cases of this kind I doubt the propriety of undertaking to prevent the payment of fees that have been contracted for. I do not know who the attorneys are or who the parties are. But you could provide by legislation as to the future.

I think that is about all I want to say, and perhaps it was not apt to say it now. And yet for several Congresses I have been watching one little matter that has come under my attention. Congress passed a general bill giving a status to sixty or seventy millions of dollars of claims against the Government, sending them to the Court of Claims for adjudication. That litigation is substantially ended and, I should say, involves the payment of from eight to ten million dollars. The remaining claims, by the judgment of the court, are rejected. But lo, and behold, legislation is knocking at the door of every session of Congress to change the law so as to give the rejected claims, amounting to multiplied millions of dollars, a new status.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know that bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar for next unanimous-consent day?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. It is for the Indian depredation claims, seeking a change in legislation to give the rejected claims another status.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield to a question right there?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more in which to ask this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON. You do not think there is any limitation in the Constitution that would prevent Congress, in such a case as the gentleman has just cited, from limiting or modifying the contract previously made so that it would do justice?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, even if a contract is made, it seems to me that you might refuse to appropriate until the attorney has receipted in full. But after all, I should be slow to vote for the violation of a contract for the recovery of damages. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 22, page 25, insert the following: "To Louis Kumm, of Pittsburg, Kans., $86.15."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it requires unanimous consent to go back to that paragraph.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would have made the point of order, but I understood the gentleman from Kansas wanted to ask unanimous consent to go back to that paragraph.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to return to that page in order to offer the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks unanimous consent to return to page 25 in order to give him opportunity to offer an amendment. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is to pay a bill amounting to $86.15 to Louis Kumm, who furnished material for the prosecution of the war, as follows: Thirty-two pounds of bar lead, at 20 cents a pound, $6.40; 15 pounds of buckshot, at 25 cents a pound, $3.75; powder, 36½ pounds, at $1.25 a pound, $45.63; 600 Colt's cartridges, at $3 per hundred, $18; 5,500 percussion caps, at $2.25 a thousand, $12.37; a total of $86.15.

This material was furnished during the war, in Missouri, to J. D. Crawford, who commanded a company of Enrolled Missouri Militia. The officers in the State of Missouri militia company certified that this amount of ammunition was furnished, and that the claim is just and ought to be paid. The State of Missouri gave a certificate authorizing the payment. This voucher, given to Mr. Kumm, has this indorsement on the back:

Headquarters, State of Missouri, acting quartermaster general's office: Jefferson City, December 1, 1864, audited and found correct, and approved for the amount of $86.15.

Now, I submit that there is not a more just or better authenticated claim in this bill than this one.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Has this bill ever gone to the Court of Claims?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. What did the court say?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The court says it has no jurisdiction.

Mr. SIMS. The Court of Claims has not passed on it favorably?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir; but a commission appointed by the State of Missouri did find the amount correct, and the items correct for which the claim is made. There has been absolutely no question anywhere about the claim, and I can state to the House that in this case there is no attorney's fee involved. Mr. Kumm is one the best citizens we have in our common country. It is rare that you find better men than he. If this claim were not correct to the exact cent Louis Kumm would not ask for its payment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have only a word to say about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, and that is, that it is on its face a claim that has not been passed upon by the Court of Claims; and therefore I submit that, however meritorious it may be, it should not be considered by this committee. This bill is made up of claims certified by the Court of Claims in accordance with references to that court under the terms of the Bowman and Tucker Acts, and, consequently, this claim, which has not been passed upon by the Court of Claims, can not be carried in this bill. I hope the amendment will be voted down. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 115 by striking out all after the word "representative," in line 11, down to and including the word "appropriated," in line 14, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That where a claimant has died the administrator, executor, or legal representative shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a bond in an amount equal to the sum hereby appropriated, with good and sufficient surety, to be approved by the said Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duty imposed upon such administrator, executor, or legal representative, with reference to the receipt, use, and disbursement of the sum hereby appropriated."

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will accept this amendment when I have explained it.

Mr. SIMS. I move that debate on all amendments to this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves that debate on all amendments to this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Tennessee will give attention, I think he will readily accept this amendment. The language of the bill, on page 115, affecting the giving of bonds, is:

Provided, That where a claimant is dead the administrator, executor, or legal representative shall file a certified copy of his bond, which bond must be at least equal in amount to the sum hereby appropriated.

There is no reference in the bill to where he shall file the bond. There is no provision in the bill as to whether or not that bond shall be accompanied by a sufficient surety. There may be doubt whether a man filing an individual bond with the Secretary of the Treasury, having nothing back of it except his name, could not compel the Secretary of the Treasury to approve the bond. The language of the amendment submitted by me simply cures what every lawyer in this House will readily recognize as a defect on the face of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. The language of the bill refers to the administrator or executor in the State wherein he is performing that function.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. It does not so state.

Mr. BARTLETT. It does so state. It says a certified copy of the bond.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The purpose of the bond, however, is to protect the estate. Now, suppose a bond for $2,000 was filed in my State or in the gentleman's State without any surety whatsoever, under the provisions of a will that the executor should give his personal bond without security. Would the gentleman say that that would serve the purpose contemplated in this bill?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely. If the decedent gave away his whole estate without requiring a bond, why should he care about this little claim going to his estate?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. There is no telling but that the claim might be vastly greater than the remainder of the estate left by the decedent.

Mr. SIMS. This is the usual language that has been in bills for years and years.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The purpose of the giving of a bond is to guard the interests of the widows and children to whom this money will ultimately be paid, and I feel that the United States Government ought to exercise the same degree of care that an ordinary individual in the ordinary walks of life would exercise. I say this provision in the bill is not worthy of adoption by this House. If it is intended to protect some one interested in the estate, the provision should be so worded as to accomplish that purpose. If it has no purpose, the provision should be stricken out entirely. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

I do not hesitate to say that I am opposed to the showing of impatience in this House when legitimate amendments are offered to important legislation affecting not only deceased persons, but affecting the widows and children left behind, whom the Government of the United States, after nearly 50 years, is now attempting to care for. When an amendment is offered in this House for the purpose of guaranteeing the decent and orderly administration of those funds, Members shout "Vote!"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding a new section after section 3:

"SEC. 4. That hereafter before the Court of Claims shall render judgment in any case referred to it under the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, respectively, such court shall make careful inquiry into all contracts for attorneys' fees and fees and compensation to be paid claim agents or other persons representing the claimant in such court before any department of Government or the Congress of the United States, and shall determine whether such compensation is reasonable. No claim shall be allowed unless the court finds the fee, if any is contracted for, to be reasonable, and in no case shall a fee of more than 25 per cent of the amount allowed on the principal claim be approved by the court."

Mr. SIMS. I make the point of order against this amendment that it is new legislation, and not germane to the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. JACKSON. I had hoped, in view of the expressions made by the eminent gentleman who is chairman of this committee, as well as other prominent gentlemen of the House in favor of some general legislation upon this subject, that the gentleman would find it in his heart not to raise the point of order to this amendment, not that I am conceding that the point is good. And, Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is not good. I can say no more in the present impatient condition of gentlemen on that side of the House, already referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE], than to say that the argument just made here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on the practice of prosecuting claims on contingent fees, costs paid by the attorney, a contract which in itself under the common law and ever since the foundation of this Government has been absolutely illegal as champertous and against public policy. Now, if this amendment is adopted it will save more to this Government in a few years to come than any amendment that has been held in order under your boasted Holman rule since this session of Congress began.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. HAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, they will be put in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO. AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a report of a special committee and ask that the report be read, and that I may be allowed to make a brief statement with reference thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to make a report from a special committee, that the report may be read, and that he may be allowed to make a brief statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the report referred to is from the special committee to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. and others. The statement I wish to make is in regard to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY], who has been ill for some time and unable to be with us in the preparation of this report. In his behalf I desire to reserve the right for him and his associates, if he desires, to file views in reference to certain legal matters. Outside of that it is a great pleasure for me to state that the report is absolutely a unanimous report, and I do not know that there will be any minority report at all. [Applause.] The report speaks for itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] have the right, if he desires, to supplement the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House Report No. 331, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO. AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARDWICK, from the special committee to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. and others, submitted the following report:

Your committee appointed under House resolution 157, adopted May 9, 1911, respectfully submits the following report:

By the provisions of the resolution under which it was appointed, your committee was directed—

"to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there have been violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the various acts supplementary thereto, by the American Sugar Refining Co., incorporated January 10, 1891, under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and the various corporations controlled thereby or holding stocks or bonds therein or whose stocks or bonds are held, in whole or in part, thereby, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, which said violations have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government.

"Said committee is also directed to investigate the organization and operations of said American Sugar Refining Co., and its relations with other persons or corporations engaged in the business of manufacturing or refining sugar, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, and if in connection therewith violations of the aforesaid laws are disclosed, to report same to the House.

"Said committee shall also inquire whether the organization and operations of the American Sugar Refining Co. and other persons or corporations having relations with it, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, have caused or had a tendency to cause any of the results:

"First. The restriction or destruction of competition among manufacturers or refiners of sugar.

"Second. An increase in price of refined sugar to the consumer or decrease in the price of sugar cane or sugar beet to the producer thereof.

"And said committee shall report to the House all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the investigation herein provided, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable."

In order that we may intelligently respond to the direction of the House to report to it such violations of the antitrust law as have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government, it is necessary for us to first outline exactly what efforts to enforce the law have been made by the Government of the United States:

(1) In March, 1892, the American Sugar Refining Co. purchased, for the purpose of consolidation and combination, its principal remaining competitors in the business of manufacturing and refining sugar in the United States. These independent refineries were located at Philadelphia, Pa. Whereupon the Government filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania against these independent refineries, alleging that the contract between them and the American Sugar Refining Co. was in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and praying that the contract be set aside. The circuit court held that the facts alleged made no case, and on demurrer dismissed the bill. This ruling was sustained by the Circuit Court of Appeals (60 Fed. Rep., 934) and subsequently by the Supreme Court of the United States (U. S. v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S., 1). It is to be noted that the Supreme Court, in sustaining the Circuit Court of Appeals, ruled that under the allegations of the bill the circuit court correctly held that the contracts sought to be enjoined and rescinded "related exclusively to the acquisition of sugar refineries and the business of sugar refining in a State . . . and which bear no direct relation to commerce between the States or with foreign nations."

(2) In July, 1909, Gustav E. Kissel and Thomas B. Harned, as well as all of the then directors of the American Sugar Refining Co., were indicted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York for a conspiracy to restrain or monopolize trade in violation of the Sherman law and in connection with an alleged attempt of the American Sugar Refining Co. to obtain control of a competitor, the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Co. Upon arraignment, Kissel and Harned pleaded the statute of limitation (three years), and their plea was sustained by the court below. The Government appealed the case to the Supreme Court. That court, on December 12, 1910, reversed the court below and remanded the case to the circuit court for trial on its merits. (U. S. v. Kissel et al., 218 U. S., 601.) The cases against Kissel and Harned and the directors of the American Sugar Refining Co. are now pending in the circuit court and an early trial thereof is anticipated.

It is important to remember that in the Kissel case the Supreme Court ruled that the indictment was good against the plea of the statute of limitations, because it charged a "continuing conspiracy."

(3) In November, 1910, the Government filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York against the American Sugar Refining Co., its directors and officers, and the various corporations allied with it and in which it owns stocks or bonds, or both, alleging a conspiracy to monopolize interstate trade in sugar in violation of the Sherman law and alleging restraint of such interstate trade in violation of said law. The bill seeks to enjoin all of the defendants from violating the Sherman law in the future, to invalidate stock ownership in any one of them by any of the others, and to dissolve the combination between them.

It is but simple justice to say that this bill seems to be both carefully and ably drawn, to be comprehensive and well adapted to accomplish the purpose at which it aims. It is now pending in the circuit court.

We come next to inquire what violations of the law have been disclosed by the investigation of your committee that have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government.

In order that our report on this phase of the question may be clearly understood it is necessary for your committee to review, as briefly as possible, the history of the sugar-refining industry of this country between 1887 and 1891.

Prior to August, 1887, the business of manufacturing or refining sugar in the United States was in the hands of 23 independent and competing concerns, some of which were corporations and others private partnerships. No one of these concerns operated over three factories or refineries, and no one of them refined over 17 per cent of the total product. These refineries had, at that time, a combined capacity of at least 17,000,000 pounds a day, and were mostly located in the great seacoast cities of the country—9 of them being in New York City and its immediate vicinity, 5 in Boston, 3 in Philadelphia, 2 in San Francisco, 2 in New Orleans, 1 in Portland, and 1 in St. Louis. In August, 1887, under the leadership of Henry O. Havemeyer, of New York, 17 of these 23 concerns, representing fully 75 per cent of the sugar-refining business of the country, combined into a powerful organization known as the Sugar Refineries Co., which operated through a board of "trustees," who controlled the business of the allied corporations and issued trustees' certificates at an agreed ratio in lieu of the capital stock of each of the combined corporations. The North River Refinery was purchased almost immediately by the organization.

All of the refineries of the country were in this combination except the three in Philadelphia, the two in San Francisco, and a small one (Nash-Spaulding & Co.) in Boston. Although the combined capital stock of the 17 corporations that entered the combination of 1887 was less than $6,000,000, yet trustees' certificates for fifty millions were authorized in lieu thereof, and even if it be said, as is probably true, that in many instances the capitalization of the combined corporations was purely nominal and the real value of its property or business was largely in excess thereof, yet it is hardly probable that the real value of the business and property of the 17 combining companies was in excess of twenty to twenty-five millions of dollars.

The "Sugar Refineries Co." having thus gotten control of the 12 refineries operated by the 9 New York corporations, of the 4 refineries in Boston, of the 2 in New Orleans, of the 1 at Portland, and the 1 at St. Louis, proceeded to inaugurate and consummate a policy of consolidation and abandonment of factories and refineries, until finally, instead of the 20 refineries that were operated by its constituent companies at the date of its formation, the combination soon operated only 4, 2 in New York City and its vicinity, 1 in Boston, and 1 in New Orleans, the others being either consolidated or abandoned. It must be remembered that during this period (1887-1890) there was no Federal statute against monopoly or restraint of trade.

In the State of New York, however, and in California as well, the State courts undertook to deal with certain phases of the situation in an endeavor to enforce State laws. In 1888 the owners of the stock of the "Sugar Refineries Co." transferred all their shares to the trustees in exchange for trust certificates. Soon afterwards the State of California, attacking this arrangement, sought to dissolve the trust. To meet this the trustees, in March, 1889, transferred the property of the refineries company in California to a committee composed of Henry O. Havemeyer, T. A. Havemeyer, and C. H. Senf.

In 1890 the highest court of New York decided that it was ultra vires for a New York corporation to enter the combination, and that by doing so it forfeited its franchise and ended its corporate life. (North River Sugar Refining Co. v. People of New York, 121 N. Y., 582.) In the meantime the Sherman Antitrust Act had been passed by Congress, July 2, 1890.

On January 10, 1891, Henry O. Havemeyer and his associates, the trustees and owners of the old "Sugar Refineries Co.," simply changing the outward form and style of the combination, incorporated the American Sugar Refining Co. under the laws of the State of New Jersey. It was capitalized at $50,000,000, precisely the capitalization of its predecessor, the "Sugar Refineries Co.," and its stock was substituted, share for share and dollar for dollar, for the fifty millions of "trustee's certificates" of that concern, except that 15 per cent was retained as "treasury stock." At the time it was chartered it controlled 75 per cent of the sugar-refining industry of the country, and its charter authorized it expressly to engage in interstate commerce in sugar in the States of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Maryland, Louisiana, and California, besides, in general terms, all the other States of the Union.

At the time it was chartered the Sherman law had been in force for more than six months, and both its organization and existence, coupled with its methods of doing business, was, as the testimony seems to indicate to your committee, a palpable and continuing violation of the Sherman law.

And yet no serious attempt was made (prior to November, 1910) to invoke the civil remedies provided by the antitrust law against the corporation.

It is also to be noted that with the exception of the prosecution of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining case, which was delayed for more than five years, the Government has not even up to the present time, so far as has appeared, made any effort to enforce the penal provisions of the Sherman law.

As directed by the resolution of the House, we will undertake to specify, as briefly as possible, the following transactions which seem to the committee, from the evidence taken, to be violations of the Sherman law:

1. The acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Co. of the independent refineries in Philadelphia in 1892. This transaction was assailed, in a way, in the E. C. Knight case, already referred to.
2. The combination between C. A. Spreckels, the elder, and the American Sugar Refining Co. in 1892 by which the American acquired the two large refineries, located at Philadelphia and San Francisco, of its largest competitor, and Spreckels became a stockholder in the American Co.
3. The purchase by the American Co. of the refinery of the Baltimore Sugar Refining Co. at Baltimore in 1891, by which a possible competitor of considerable strength was eliminated by the American Co.
4. The purchase in March, 1893, by the American Sugar Refining Co. of 3,000 shares of the capital stock of one of its active competitors, the Mollenhauer Sugar Refining Co.
5. An agreement between the American Sugar Refining Co. and practically all of its competitors in March, 1894, by which the production of the various refineries that were parties to the agreement was to be limited and by which the price to be charged for refined sugar was to be fixed by the parties to the agreement.
6. The acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Co. of the refinery of a competitor, the United States Sugar Refining Co. of New Jersey. This occurred in September, 1897.
7. The combination of four independent and competing refineries into a corporation known as the National Sugar Refining Co. in 1900 and the acquisition at that time of a large interest in the National by the American Co.
8. The contract in April, 1903, between the Western Sugar Refining Co. (the San Francisco subsidiary corporations belonging to the American Co. and John D. and Adolph Spreckels) and the California-Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co., in which the former agreed to take over the contracts of the latter company for raw sugar at an agreed price and to pay the latter company $200,000 per year for three years, and in consideration thereof the California-Hawaiian Co. was to close its refinery and not to purchase raw sugar or sell refined sugar for a period of three years. This contract was carried out and was intended to give and did give the said Western Sugar Co. a practical monopoly of interstate commerce in refined sugar on the Pacific coast and in many Western States during the period of its existence.

BEET-SUGAR OPERATIONS.

9. The trade war waged in September, 1901, by the American Co. and its allies upon the beet-sugar companies in order to obtain control of them and destroy competition.
10. The appointment, in December, 1901, by the directors of the American Co. of a committee of four, consisting of Messrs. Havemeyer, Thomas, Palmer, and Donner, for the express purpose of acquiring a large interest and influence in the beet-sugar interests of the United States, the beet-sugar factories having by that time become serious competitors of the cane-sugar refineries.
11. The purchase by the American Sugar Refining Co. in December, 1902, of $7,500,000 of the capital stock of the American Beet Sugar Co. This has since been sold.
12. The contract of December, 1902, between the American Sugar Refining Co. and the American Beet Sugar Co. by which the latter company constituted the former its factor or agent for the disposal of its product, agreeing to "avoid the markets of the refining company." This agreement has not been in force since 1905.
13. The agreement in August, 1894, between the Western Beet Sugar Co. and the Western Sugar Refining Co. (American), by which the beet-sugar company agreed to cease to manufacture and sell refined sugar and to manufacture raw sugar only, which the refining company agreed to buy.
14. The purchase in 1897 by the American Sugar Refining Co. of one-half of the capital stock of the Spreckels Sugar (Beet) Co. of California.
15. The purchase of large blocks of stock from 1902 to 1906, by the American Sugar Refining Co., in the Michigan Sugar Co.
16. The acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Co., between 1902 and 1906, of large interests in the Great Western Sugar Co., a corporation under the laws of New Jersey, which is influenced by the American Co. through its stock ownership therein.
17. The acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Co. in 1901, 1902, and 1903, of one-half interest in "The Utah-Idaho Sugar Co."
18. The purchase by the American Sugar Refining Co. in 1902, of one-half of the capital stock of the Amalgamated Sugar Co.
19. The acquisition, in 1903, by the American Sugar Refining Co. of a large interest in the Lewiston (Utah) Sugar Co., a projected competitor.
20. The purchase, in February, 1903, by the American company of a large interest in its competitor, the Alameda (Cal.) Sugar Co.
21. An unlawful agreement of February 19, 1903, between the Alameda Sugar Co. and the American Sugar Refining Co., by which the former company constituted the latter company its factor or agent for the disposal of its product, agreeing to "avoid the markets of the refining company."

It must be remembered that many of these specifications refer to extended business operations of great magnitude, involving many different transactions as a part of the whole scheme to monopolize interstate trade in sugar.

Indeed, it seems to us that from its organization, on January 10, 1891, until 1907, at least, almost every step in the industrial development of the American Sugar Refining Co. was a well-considered part of a carefully planned campaign to secure and maintain a monopoly in interstate trade in sugar, to obtain complete control thereof, and to forestall, destroy, or weaken competition therein. Since 1907 new influences have controlled the company, and the testimony does not show a continuation of the policy in investing in competing concerns, but does show that some of the properties previously acquired have been sold.

By the above statement, however, your committee does not wish to be understood as entertaining or expressing the opinion that even since 1907 the American Sugar Refining Co. is not existing in violation of the antitrust law. (An affidavit filed with the committee by the American Sugar Refining Co. since the testimony was printed shows that within a few months the company has disposed of its interest in the Western Refining Co., of California, and the Carver County Sugar Co., of Minnesota.)

(Certificate filed in New York County.)

After the hearings had been concluded, your committee received from the American Sugar Refining Co. the above affidavit as to certain sales that had been made by it of its interest in the Western Sugar Refining Co. and certain stocks in beet-sugar companies. This affidavit is above set out in full, not being elsewhere published in the records of your committee.

RESTRICTION OR DESTRUCTION OF COMPETITION.

Your committee was also directed to report whether or not existing conditions in the sugar industry "have caused or had a tendency to cause restriction or destruction of competition among the manufacturers or refiners of sugar."

The Sugar Refineries Co. of 1887 was, as we have already stated, a combination between the manufacturers and refiners of sugar who had produced 75 per cent of the total refined production, and who had prior to its formation been active and at times fierce competitors of each other. Among the admitted purposes of its organizers and promoters was the "elimination of cutthroat competition," "the consolidation of plants," "the limitation of production," and "the control of prices," as well as "more economical production and distribution."

Its policy was to destroy or harmonize competition and to curtail as well as cheapen production. The result of that policy was manifest when by consolidation and elimination the combination had reduced the number of its refineries in actual operation from 20 competing factories to just 4, all under the same control. In January, 1888, it bought the old American Sugar Refining Co., a competitor at San Francisco, exchanging its "trustees' certificates" for the stock of that corporation. When this transaction was assailed in the courts of California, the Sugar Refineries Co. met the assault by causing the San Francisco corporation to transfer all of its property and business, in March, 1889, to three of the directors of the refineries company, namely, H. O. Havemeyer, T. A. Havemeyer, and Charles H. Senf, who thereafter carried on its business under the name of Havemeyers & Elder, but for the benefit and under the control of the refineries company. It thus acquired a foothold on the Pacific coast, and added a fifth refinery to its list of those in active operation.

When the American Sugar Refining Co. was organized under the laws of New Jersey, on January 10, 1891, it took over the property of the Sugar Refineries Co., being merely a new corporate name for the same industrial organization. It controlled 75 per cent of the sugar-refining business of the country and began the operation of the four refineries that were under the direct control of the old organization, and soon thereafter took direct control of the San Francisco refinery that had nominally belonged to Havemeyers & Elder, paying therefor with stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. At that time its five refineries (including San Francisco) had a combined daily melting capacity of twelve and one-half million pounds out of a total of about sixteen and one-half million pounds for the entire country.

At that time it had only five competitors in the United States, three of which were small ones. To name the latter first, they were:

"1. Nash, Spalding & Co., Boston, Mass., 350,000 pounds daily melting capacity.

"2. Delaware Sugar House, Philadelphia, 150,000 pounds daily melting capacity.

"3. E. C. Knight & Co., Philadelphia, 500,000 pounds daily melting capacity."

It had also two other competitors, which were stronger than the above, but much weaker and smaller than the American. These were:

"4. Franklin Sugar Refining Co., Philadelphia (the Harrisons), 2,000,000 pounds daily melting capacity.

"5. California Sugar Refining Co. (Spreckels), San Francisco, 1,000,000 pounds daily melting capacity."

So it will be seen that Spreckels was the only competitor of the American on the Pacific coast and in the West, and the Harrisons, at Philadelphia, its principal and only strong competitor in the East.

In February, 1892, the American Co., through Searles, bought its competitor, the Delaware Sugar House, paying therefor in stock of the American Co.

On March 10, 1892, the American Co., through Searles and Parson, bought out its competitor, the Franklin Sugar Refining Co., paying therefor in stock of the American.

It will thus be seen that between the date of its organization, January 10, 1891, and March 10, 1892, just 14 months, the American Sugar Refining Co. had completely destroyed and absorbed its eastern competition, the only independent refinery left in the East being that of Nash, Spalding & Co., at Boston, refining less than 3 per cent of the eastern product.

Let us turn now to the dealings of the American with the elder Spreckels. It will be recalled that in January, 1888, the old refineries company acquired a San Francisco refinery, though forced for some time, by legal proceedings in California, to operate it in the name of Havemeyers & Elder. The acquisition and operation of this factory brought them into active competition with C. A. Spreckels, of San Francisco, who owned and operated a refinery of about equal size (1,000,000 pounds daily melting capacity), and this competition finally resulted in a fierce trade war between the two, in which the sugar refineries combination appeared to be the aggressors. Spreckels, however, seems to have been a man of determined character and indomitable courage, for in June, 1890, he carried the war into the East, chartering the Spreckels Sugar Refining Co., beginning the erection of a refinery at Philadelphia of double the capacity (2,000,000 pounds daily) of his San Francisco plant.

The completion of this plant in 1891 and its operation seems to have brought the American (who had by this time succeeded the refineries company) to terms, for in March, 1891, the trade war on the Pacific coast between the American and Spreckels was ended by the formation of the Western Sugar Refining Co., one-half of the stock of which was owned by Spreckels and the other half by the American, to which company was leased the plant of the two former competitors, viz, the California Sugar Refining Co. (Spreckels) and Havemeyers & Elder (American), the latter company being closed by the lessee and kept closed until destroyed by fire in 1906. This lease, renewed from time to time, is still in force, having been renewed up to December 31, 1917.

Having thus effectually settled their differences and destroyed competition on the Pacific coast, the "high contracting parties," the American and Spreckels, turned their attention eastward, where it will be remembered Spreckels had made a strong counter demonstration with his Philadelphia concern, the Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. In November, 1891, terms of complete peace and amity were agreed upon and signed. By those terms Spreckels agreed to sell 45 per cent of the stock of his Philadelphia corporation to H. O. Havemeyer, T. A. Havemeyer, and John E. Searles, at par for cash, with the understanding that the American was subsequently to purchase the entire capital stock at two for one, paying therefor in American stock. This arrangement was carried out in March, 1892, so far as the American's part of the transaction is concerned.

So, early in 1892, within little more than a year after its organization, the American Sugar Refining Co. had practically destroyed all competition and had a practically complete monopoly of the sugar-refining business of the United States, controlling 90 per cent of the sugar-refining industry.

Other instances in which the American either forestalled, controlled, or absorbed competition have already been outlined in a previous part of this report in the specifications of violations of the antitrust law numbered from 3 to 21, inclusive.

Without repeating the statements contained in these specifications in each case, we wish to call attention to the general development of the industrial policy of this corporation and to some especial and striking instances thereof.

By March, 1892, as we have just seen, the American had practically a complete monopoly of the sugar-refining industry of the United States. It had completely absorbed every competitor in the East, except Nash, Spalding & Co., and in the West it had acquired a one-half interest in the Western Sugar Refining Co., in partnership with Spreckels, and, through the agency of that corporation, the complete control of the industry on the Pacific coast and in the extreme West.

From March, 1892, up to 1898 the industrial history of the company is simply a recital of threatened competitors forestalled or bought, of actual competitors, when they insisted upon entering the business, either controlled or acquired, of the organization of subsidiary companies and dependent combinations in the place of independent and active competitors; of a powerful monopoly, shrewdly organized, carefully operated, and strongly maintained against all comers.

ARBuckle BROS.

In 1898, however, stronger competition than the American Co. had faced since the days of the elder Spreckels manifested itself, when Arbuckle Bros., the great coffee manufacturers, having a disagreement with the American's president, Havemeyer, entered the sugar-refining business in New York City.

Almost coincidentally the American Co. entered the coffee business, purchasing the Woolson Spice Co., a coffee factory at Toledo, Ohio. This war continued with varying fortunes until (probably) the spring of 1903. It was fierce at all times. The Arbuckles admit during its continuation they lost large sums of money, and one of the working partners (Mr. Gilmore) stated that while it lasted the American not only failed to make any profits, but, "according to common rumor, had expended $15,000,000 of their surplus and gone into the market to borrow money." The head of the firm of Arbuckle Bros., Mr. John Arbuckle, expressly denies that when the "war" ceased it did so because of any express agreement between Mr. Havemeyer and himself, but he admits numerous conferences between them in which he used these expressions: "Gentlemen, the world is big enough for all of us, but, gentlemen, we must have no agreement about production, or prices, or anything. I always had that in mind." And, again, "suppose you do—suppose you do bankrupt others. Then you would put them in the hands of a receiver and there would be worse competition than before."

In this connection it is worthy of note that another independent refiner, Mr. C. A. Spreckels (the younger), president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., testified that Mr. Arbuckle tried to get him to come to terms with Havemeyer and reduce the capacity of the Federal; that Arbuckle stated that he and Havemeyer had "buried the hatchet," intimating that the agreement had been reached by the reduction of production of the Arbuckle refinery, and urging the same course upon Spreckels. This Mr. Arbuckle denied.

It is undoubtedly true that about 1903 the "war" did end, and about the same time the American Co. did quit the coffee business, closing down its Toledo coffee business and finally selling it in 1910 to a New York coffee concern.

Further, it is admitted that since 1903, to use the language of Mr. Gilmore, of Arbuckle Bros., a state of "armed neutrality" has existed between the American and Arbuckle Bros., and it is quite evident that such an understanding exists up to this moment between the two concerns.

The next formidable competition for the American Co. after Arbuckle Bros., seemed to threaten from the beet-sugar industry of the country. Prior to the passage of the Dingley tariff law of 1897, the beet-sugar production of the United States had been relatively insignificant, never reaching over 10,000 tons (long) prior to 1893 and never as high as 20,000 tons prior to 1895. But in 1897-8 it passed 40,000 tons, and by 1901-2 it was over 163,000 tons, one-half as great as the domestic production of cane sugar for that year, although supplying less than 10 per cent of the total consumption of the United States.

In the summer of 1901 the American Sugar Refining Co. and its allies undertook an aggressive campaign against the beet-sugar companies, who were then 31 in number, separate and independent concerns, competitors of each other and of the American and its allies. This war seems to have been hottest in the territory supplied by the Missouri River points. According to one of its participants—Mr. Oxnard—the American lowered the price of sugar to 3½ cents overnight—October 1 or October 2, 1901—at a time when the beet-sugar people had large contracts already made to deliver sugar "at the market."

Finally concluding that beet sugar "had come to stay," the American rapidly and completely reversed its policy. In the fall of 1901, after a preliminary inspection of the field had been made for Mr. Havemeyer by Mr. Willett, of Willett & Gray, Mr. Havemeyer, for the American, dealing with Thomas R. Cutler, who represented the Utah Sugar Co., acquired a one-half interest in the latter concern, which was one of the first established (though under a different corporate name) of the beet-sugar enterprises. One of the American's then officials (Mr. Lowell M. Palmer) says the American dealt first with the Mormons in Utah because he felt "that the Mormon Church, in a measure, controlled its people, and that we (the American) would be more liable to get sugar beets." This was the beginning of a comprehensive campaign of beet-sugar acquisitions by the American.

On September 18, 1901, the capital stock of the American Co. was increased from $75,000,000 to $90,000,000, and this money was used to purchase for the American extensive beet-sugar interests.

The minutes of the directors of that company (p. 43) of December 2, 1902, contain this significant entry:

"On motion, Messrs. Havemeyer, Thomas, Palmer, and Donner were appointed a committee to take charge of the purchase and management of beet-sugar companies."

The minutes of both the board of directors and of the executive committee of the American team with the record of specific transactions in which the American, from month to month and from year to year, acquired interest in its beet sugar competitors.

Finally, by 1909, the American had acquired large interests in 11 of the beet-sugar companies, operating 32 factories, and producing about 64 per cent of the beet sugar of the country, as follows: Four companies, operating 11 factories in Michigan, Iowa, and Ohio, and producing about 50 per cent of the beet sugar of those States; 3 companies, operating 11 factories in the States of Colorado, Montana, and Nebraska, and producing 67 per cent of the beet sugar of those States; 3 companies, which operate 10 factories in the States of Utah, Idaho, and Oregon, and produce all of the beet sugar of those States; 2 companies, operating 3 factories in the State of California, and producing 46 per cent of the beet sugar of that State.

From 1909 to the present time the situation has not been greatly altered, as will be observed from the following tables furnished your committee by the American under date of October 11, 1911:

The production of these 11 beet companies, in which the American is so largely interested, was, according to the above table, 546,049,181 pounds, which, reduced to tons (long), would be 243,750 tons. These figures were for the season of 1910-11, and it appears from the testimony of Mr. Truman Palmer (Hearings, p. 2627), secretary of the Beet Sugar Association, that the total production of all the beet-sugar companies of the United States for the season of 1910-11 was 445,000 tons. It will therefore be seen that the beet companies in which the American is so largely interested produced during that season almost 54 per cent of all the beet sugar of the United States.

PRESENT CONDITIONS.

Passing to the consideration of present conditions, so far as competition is concerned in the sugar-manufacturing industry of the country, we call your attention first of all to the following statement of the present chief executive officer of the American, Mr. Edwin F. Atkins, chairman of the board of directors, on this question (see Hearings, p. 43):

NOTE.—The amount of sugar credited to the American Sugar Refining Co. includes one-half of the amount refined by the Western Sugar Refining Co., of California, in which the American Sugar Refining Co. has a one-half interest. The figures in regard to the production of the American Sugar Refining Co. are taken from Willett & Gray's Sugar Statistics. The figures in regard to the production of independents are not given separately by Willett & Gray, but are the best estimates obtainable.

Analyzing the above table, let us consider how independent each of the so-called independents really is:

1. McCahan, beginning business in 1894, produced in that year 600,000 barrels, and in 1909, 700,000 barrels.

In June, 1900, the McCahan Co. sold 25 per cent of its capital stock to the National Sugar Refining Co., of New Jersey, in which the American owns a very large if not a controlling stock interest.

2. Arbuckle Bros., beginning business in 1899, and now producing 1,900,000 barrels, or 8.7 per cent of the total refined production of the country. It does not seem to your committee that since the conclusion of the sugar-coffee war, in 1903, between the houses of Havemeyer and Arbuckle, that these concerns are keen competitors. It seems more reasonable to conclude from all of the evidence that a condition of "armed neutrality" exists between the two, and that the two concerns understood each other very well.

3. The Federal, of which Mr. C. A. Spreckels is president, began operations in 1902, according to its president (hearings, p. 2220). Its production in 1909 was 1,370,000 barrels, or 6.3 per cent of the total production of the country. We believe, from the evidence presented, that the Federal is independent and has no sort of an understanding or agreement, direct or indirect, express or implied, with the American or its allies, or with any other competitor.

4. Warner, beginning business in 1908 with an output of 450,000 barrels and producing in 1909 550,000 barrels, or 2.5 per cent of the total product. So far as the evidence discloses, there is nothing to show but that this company is just as independent as the Federal, and we do not find any evidence that it has any understanding of any kind with any competitor.

5. The National, established in 1900, and producing in 1909 2,170,000 barrels, or 10 per cent of the total product of the country. This company was organized by H. O. Havemeyer, through James H. Post, in 1900, as an ally of the American, which bought, soon after the organization of the National, 51,280 shares, of the par value of $5,128,000, of the preferred stock, a majority of the total issue (ten millions) thereof, which stock it has held ever since and now holds. It is charged that the issue of $10,000,000 worth of common stock of the National to Henry O. Havemeyer and others was without consideration and that the whole of the common stock of the National is invalid. That question is now being stubbornly litigated in the courts of New Jersey, and we have no desire to either prejudice or prejudice that case by any expression of opinion.

If the validity of this National common stock can not be sustained, the American will have the absolute control by ownership of a majority of all the valid stock of its largest single "competitor" in the United States, the National. Even if the common stock of the National be upheld, it seems to us that the interest of the American in that company is too large to permit the two companies to be real competitors of each other or to justify the classification of the National as in any sense a competitor of the American as a refiner.

6. So far as your committee can discover, the Louisiana Planters' Refining Co., producing 650,000 barrels, or 3 per cent of the total sugar product, is independent, and the same thing is true of the Revere at Boston, the successor of Nash-Spalding & Co., but the production of the latter company is an insignificant per cent of the total production, being only about 350,000 pounds daily.

7. The California-Hawaiian: The president of this company claims that it is absolutely independent and that it has no agreement for allotment of production or territory with anyone (Hearings, p. 3053), but the contract of April, 1903, between the Western Sugar Refining Co. (the American) and the California-Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co., by which the latter closed down its factory and went out of business for a period of three years, ought to be remembered whenever it is sought to classify the California-Hawaiian as a real independent and a bona fide competitor of the American (or the Western). In this connection it seems from the evidence of Mr. C. A. Spreckels (Hearings, p. 2230) that an allotment of territory and of product exists between the Western (American), the California-Hawaiian, and the Honolulu Plantations Co.

8. The beet-sugar companies: These are classed, all of them, by Mr. Atkins as "independent." We can not agree with this classification. As has already been shown in this report, the American owns 41 per cent of the stock of 11 companies, operating many beet factories, that produce 54 per cent of all the beet sugar of the United States. Surely these 11 companies, representing a little more than half of the beet-sugar production of the country, can not be regarded as real "competitors" or as in any important sense independent of the American. If not, then of the 14 per cent of the country's consumption of sugar that is produced by all the beet-sugar companies, a little over one-half—7 per cent—is not "independent of the American Sugar Refining Co." As to the remaining beet-sugar companies, producing nearly one-half, or 48 per cent of the total beet-sugar production of the country, they are real competitors of the American Sugar Refining Co. (Hearings, pp. 1168 and 1201.)

Revising, in the light of the evidence, the table furnished by the American, we find:

To the 42.14 per cent of the production of sugar in the United States that the American admits is its own should be added, by any fair rule, 10 per cent, the National's production, 7 per cent, the production of the beet-sugar companies in which the American is interested, and probably 3.25 per cent, the McCahan production. This makes a total of 20.25 per cent, which, added to the 42.14 per cent, makes a total of 62.39 per cent of the sugar manufacturing and refining industry of the United States which is either directly or indirectly controlled or influenced by the American, and we may add further that the evidence discloses that competitors not within the direct influence of the American are cautious about entering into active competition with it, and usually fix their prices in a comfortable vicinity to those of the American.

INCREASE IN PRICE TO CONSUMER.

Your committee was also directed to report whether existing conditions in the sugar industry "have caused or had a tendency to cause an increase in the price of refined sugar to the consumer."

The influence of combination upon the price of refined sugar to a very large extent must be found in the margin between the price of raw sugar and that of refined sugar. The price of raw sugar, which constitutes by far the greater part of the cost of refined sugar, is affected by causes almost, if not entirely, beyond the control of any refiner or combination of refiners. It depends primarily on supply and demand as affected by world condition of the crop. Under conditions as they are in the United States the tariff duty imposed by the Government on raw sugar also affects the price. If there were no combination, and if there were no duty, the price of raw sugar, and consequently of refined sugar, might, from unfavorable crop conditions or from a small supply to meet a large demand, be higher than it would even with a combination of manufacturers or a high duty, but with bountiful crops and a supply in excess of demand.

But the effect of combination among refiners and manufacturers of raw sugar, and the presence or absence of healthy competition, is surely reflected in the variation of the margin between the prices of raw and refined sugar. During the nine years prior to the formation of the "sugar refineries" combination the margin had averaged nearly $1.10 per hundred pounds, but in the four years preceding the formation of that organization severe competition among the refiners had reduced it to an average of 79.6 cents per hundred. In 1885 it was 71.2 cents, and in 1886 it was 78.1 cents per hundred pounds. (Testimony of Mr. Atkins, Hearings, p. 125.) In 1887, prior to the formation of the "trust," 76.8 cents; in 1888, when the refiners' trust had become well organized, it was $1.25; in 1889 it was $1.207. In 1890, because of the competition of Philadelphia independents (testimony of Atkins, Hearings, p. 126, and of Spreckels), it fell to 72 cents, rising to 82.8 cents in 1891 and to $1.035 in 1892, after the Philadelphia independents were purchased by the American. In 1893 it was $1.153; in 1894 it was 88 cents; 1895, 88.2 cents; in 1896, 90.8 cents; in 1897, 94.6 cents. The drop between 1893 and 1894 and the years immediately following can probably be accounted for, because of the higher price of raw sugar during those years and the consequent greater value of the 5 per cent of waste in refining.

In 1898 the refiner's margin fell rapidly to 73 cents and in 1899 to 50 cents, the effect of the sharp competition of Arbuckle. In 1900, when the Arbuckle "war" was not quite so fierce, it rose to 75.4 cents. In 1901, when there was practical peace with Arbuckle, it rose to $1.003. It was 91.3 cents in 1902, 91.8 in 1903, 79.8 in 1904, the probable effect of beet-sugar production, relatively slight, being shown particularly in the last year. In 1905, by which time the American had acquired a large interest in beet sugar, it rose to 97.8 cents; in 1908, 88.4 cents; 1909, 75.8 cents; in 1910 it was 78.4 cents; and in 1911 it was 89.2. It is worthy of note in connection with the figures for the years 1904 to 1909, inclusive, during which the refiner's margin ranged lower, with the exception of the year 1905, than the years immediately preceding them, that the American was subjected to the active and progressive competition of independents.

It is especially worthy of note that in 1889, when the refiner's margin was $1.25, the Sugar Refineries Co. had a practical monopoly, controlling 75 per cent of the production. By 1903 it will be remembered that the American had secured control of nearly 90 per cent of the industry, and during that year the refiner's difference was the highest in the history of the industry since 1889, being $1.153.

The climax of the Arbuckle competition is reflected in the margin of 50 cents for the year 1899, the lowest in the history of the industry.

The influence, both of the beet-sugar companies and of the Federal and of Warner's, is reflected in the somewhat lower margins prevailing since 1904, and including that year.

That the price of refined sugar had been kept up in order to pay dividends on bounteously watered stocks is also evident when we come to consider overcapitalization, which we will carefully examine in another part of this report.

That the overcapitalization of these corporations and the payment of dividends on watered stocks, so that the same might acquire a market value, has necessitated excessive profits on the real capital invested, and has consequently occasioned higher prices for the product and heavier taxation of the consumer, can hardly be questioned by anyone who conscientiously investigates conditions in this great industry. To what exact extent this has increased the price of refined sugar to the consumer it is absolutely impossible to accurately estimate or exactly state, but that the increase for that reason is considerable can not be disputed.

The contention of the American Sugar Refining Co., that because sugar costs the consumer less to-day than it did when that corporation was organized, therefore the existence and operation of the corporation has benefited rather than injured the consumer, we regard as unsound. Such a contention entirely ignores most important considerations, such as improvements in the processes and reduction in the cost of refining and manufacturing during that period of time; the greater supply of raw material; improved methods of cultivating sugar cane and sugar beets; and a perfect host of conditions that are entirely independent of the existence of the American or any other sugar refining or manufacturing company.

Besides, in the last 20 years the reduction in price has been worldwide, embracing in its scope all the countries of the earth, from the most enlightened to the most barbarous; and surely no American corporation can claim that it accomplished this result in countries where it has no business and where its very name is practically unknown. In the opinion of your committee, the reduction in the price of sugar in the last 20 years to the American consumer did not come because of the organization and operation of the American Sugar Refining Co.

In connection with its investigation of sugar prices, your committee, through the courtesy of the Department of State, has had the reports on the wholesale and retail prices of sugar from every country on earth where our Government maintains a consular service. These tables of foreign prices are submitted as a part of this report, and we herewith submit an analysis of same. (See Hearings, pp. 3575 to 3862.)

We invite attention to the following table, showing comparative wholesale prices on raw and refined sugar, with the duty added, and without the duty, in the countries named:

Year 1910, average quotations, net cash, in cents per pound.

Country.	Raw in bond.	Tax refined.	Wholesale refined tax paid.	Refined in bond.
England.....	2.848	0.400	4.101	3.706

France.....	3.134	2.380	6.450	4.070
United States.....	2.840	1.900	4.972	3.532

We conclude this portion of our report with a quotation from the Report of 1911 of the British Board of Trade on the Cost of Living in the Principal Cities of the United States.

That report, from an investigation made in 1909, says:

"The general uniformity prevailing in the price of sugar is a reflection of the extensive control exercised over this particular market by a single company."

DECREASE IN THE PRICE TO THE PRODUCER.

SUGAR CANE.

Practically all of the cane from which sugar is refined that is produced in the United States is produced in the State of Louisiana. In the sugar campaign of 1910-11 the production of cane sugar in the United States was 311,000 long tons, all of which, except a few thousand tons produced in Texas, came from Louisiana. In Louisiana there are three sugar refineries in actual operation. The great Chalmette factory of the American, at New Orleans, opened in 1909, with a daily melting capacity of 12,000 barrels; the Henderson refinery, at New Orleans, with a capacity of about 1,000 barrels per day; and the Colonial, operated by Howell & Co., at Gramercy, with a capacity of not exceeding 2,000 barrels per day.

The Louisiana cane producers contend that they have never received fair treatment from the American in the sale of raw sugar, that company "paying as little as possible" therefor. (Hearings, p. 1841.) An effort by the Federal, only partially successful, to purchase raw sugar in November, 1907, was promptly resented by the American, that company boycotting for a time those persons who sold to the Federal at a price higher than the American would pay. (Hearings, pp. 1844-1845.)

The American evidently resented this invasion of a market they regarded as peculiarly their own, and even since the death of Mr. Havemeyer, in December, 1907, the policy of the company does not seem to have changed until the crop of 1911 and 1912. (Hearings, p. 1845.) In 1909 and 1910 certain of the Louisiana producers sought to avoid this trouble, as well as to obtain a higher price for their raw sugar, by selling the same to Arbuckle Bros., delivered in New York. This resulted in raising the New Orleans price of raw sugar 15 points. (Hearings, p. 1846.) The Louisiana producers complain that the American consistently and continually kept the New Orleans market for raw sugar a quarter of a cent under New York quotations, being enabled to do so because they had no strong competition and were strong enough to keep competitors out of the New Orleans market. The producers also contend that the American invariably keeps the New Orleans market for raw sugar at least 15 cents a hundred below the New York market, that being about the amount of the freight rate between the two cities. The American admits this difference in price between the two markets, but insists that it is a fair difference because its factory, the Chalmette, will not refine more than 75,000 tons of the 180,000 tons of Louisiana sugar that the American purchases each year. (Hearings, p. 2441.) From the evidence of Mr. Willett it appears that this difference was not maintained for the crop marketed in 1911.

It appears that of the 300,000 tons of Louisiana raw sugar the American buys about 63 per cent, about 20 per cent goes into direct consumption as plantation sugars, and about 17 per cent is bought by the Colonial, Henderson, and occasionally other buyers. (Hearings, p. 2440.)

It seems to your committee that the American takes every advantage of the Louisiana producer that the absence of strong competition enables it to take, as might be expected, and that its defense that at least the freight rate to New York (15 points) ought to be deducted from the New York price for sugar sold at New Orleans, because its New Orleans factory will not refine much more than 40 per cent of its purchase of Louisiana raw sugar, was disingenuous and unfair, when we realize that the American, in accordance with its general policy, only buys raw sugar at New Orleans in excess of its requirements for its New Orleans refinery when, in its judgment, raw sugar is a good purchase and it will be profitable to hold it until the price advances so that the refiner can make a larger profit. (Hearings, pp. 2441-2460.)

Compared to the American, both Henderson and the Colonial are so small and weak that they do not afford strong competition and leave the Louisiana producer at the mercy of the American to a large extent.

INSULAR CANE SUGAR.

In the Hawaiian Islands the sugar planters are thoroughly organized and able to protect themselves. A majority of the "independent" sugar planters have formed a combination known as the Factor's Co., disposing of their product as a whole, usually to the California-Hawaiian Co., of San Francisco, which they own and control. That company in turn is charged with having an understanding with the Western (one-half owned by the American), and at one time, as we have already reported, made a contract with the latter company for the closing down of its refinery for a period of three years. The Factor's Co. sells in New York to the American exclusively, and competitors of the American complain that the Factor's Co. will not sell to them, even at a better price.

Besides, the American and its allies, John D. Spreckels and A. B. Spreckels, seem to own most, if not all, of Hawaiian plantations that are not in the Factor's combination, so that the Hawaiian sugar planters seem to have very close relations with the American's system. What effect the American Co.'s recent sale of its interest in the San Francisco refining business may have on this situation we can not say.

So far as the evidence we have taken shows there has been no complaint of unfair treatment by the American Co. or any other refiners of the sugar planters of Porto Rico or the Philippines. It does appear, however, that certain gentlemen who are now or were until recently either directors or closely allied to the American have acquired considerable interests in the sugar industry of Porto Rico, of the Philippine Islands, and of Cuba. The gentlemen referred to are Messrs. Charles H. Seuff, Edwin F. Atkins, Horace Havemeyer, and James H. Post, president of the National.

BEET SUGAR.

Your committee reports that the evidence as taken does not disclose combinations between manufacturers in the beet-sugar industry that have caused or had a tendency to cause a decrease in the cost of sugar beets thereof. In California the price of beets in 1911 was $5.30 per ton of beets grading 16 per cent, and a contract has been made for an increase of 75 cents per ton for the year 1912. (Hearings, p. 3873.)

In Utah and Idaho the ruling price is $5 per ton and freight, which makes the beets cost, delivered at the factory, over $5.60 to $5.65 per ton. (Hearings, p. 797.)

In Colorado and Nebraska the price averages from $5.50 per ton to $6.50 per ton. (Hearings, pp. 400, 888.)

In Michigan and Ohio the customary contract calls for a payment by the factory of $4.50 per ton for beets testing 12 per cent sugar with 33½ cents per ton for each additional per cent of sugar in the beets, with a minimum guaranty of $5 per ton. (Hearings, p. 719.)

Under such form of contract, coupled with the freight charges paid by the factory, the average price paid by one of the leading Michigan companies in 1910 was $6.91 per ton. (Hearings, p. 712.)

These figures represent an increase in price to the farmer for his beets over the price of former years. This increase has been largely caused by improved methods of culture and increasing sugar contents of the beets, though doubtless accelerated by the demand of the farmer for higher prices.

GENERAL FINDINGS.

Your committee was also directed to "report all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the investigation," together "with such recommendations as it may deem advisable."

In our endeavor to comply with the resolution of the House and make the investigation ordered by it we have spent many weeks taking testimony, both oral and documentary, all of which has been carefully reported and printed and is herewith submitted in connection with this report.

We deem it proper, however, in addition to the special findings already made, to call the attention of the House to certain striking features of the situation in the sugar industry as disclosed by our own investigation and to submit certain recommendations in respect thereto.

SUGAR INDUSTRY OF THE WORLD AND OF THE UNITED STATES.

In 1870 the sugar production of the world was approximately 2,500,000 long tons, two-thirds of which was made from cane and one-third from the beet. Nearly all of this beet sugar was produced in France, Germany, Austria, and Russia. The United States produced that year only 407 tons of beet sugar, a negligible quantity. (Hearings, pp. 2624, 2625.)

In 1870 refined sugar normally sold wholesale at 13½ cents a pound in the United States (or about 11 cents a pound if we allow for depreciated currency), and in the United States the consumption was 35½ pounds per capita. (Hearings, p. 44.)

In the year 1910 the world's production of sugar was almost 17,000,000 tons. Of this amount almost one-half (49.5 per cent) was cane and just a little over one-half (50.5 per cent) was beet sugar. (Hearings, pp. 2624-2889.)

The principal sources of supply were:

	Tons.
European beet sugar (about).....	8,000,000
Cuban cane sugar (about).....	1,750,000
Java cane sugar (about).....	1,250,000
Continental United States, beet and cane sugar (about).....	800,000
Island possessions (about).....	850,000

The largest sugar-consuming countries of the world were the United Kingdom (86.3 pounds per capita) and the United States (81.6 pounds per capita). (Hearings, p. 2695.)

In the United States in 1910 the price of refined sugar at wholesale was normally 4.97 cents a pound. (Hearings, p. 176.)

Besides the absolute prices of sugar there is another fact, viz, the differentiation of sugar prices from the prices of other commodities. This is shown by the following table (Hearings, p. 3600):

It may be noted in this connection that at the end of each year the world has a surplus of from 700,000 to 1,000,000 tons of sugar. (Hearings, p. 3562.)

The cost of manufacturing beet sugar is lowest in Germany, where the industry has also been longest established and most highly developed. In the sugar-crop year of 1908-9, according to the famous English sugar expert, Mr. George Martineau, the cost of producing a pound of beet sugar, raw, ranged from 1.96 to 2.07 cents. (Hearings, pp. 2693 and 2794.) Adding the cost of refining, about 0.40 cent per pound (Hearings, pp. 3804-3813), the cost of producing refined beet sugar in Germany would be from 2.36 to 2.47 cents per pound, an average of 2.41½ cents per pound.

At one time, under the stimulus of a bounty system that was about to end (in 1902), the Hamburg export price for raw beet sugar fell to 1.79 cents per pound.

In stating the average cost of refined beet sugar made in the United States, we give first the figures of Mr. Palmer, secretary of an association of the principal beet-sugar companies. (Hearings, p. 2630.)

The cost of production of beet sugar per pound in this country, Mr. Palmer states, is as follows:

	Cents.
1889.....	4.25
1904.....	3.86
1909.....	3.67

The figures of the cost of beet production since the last date given by Mr. Palmer (1909) we have obtained from the financial reports made by the 11 beet-sugar companies in which the American is interested to that corporation. (Hearings, p. 2379.)

These reports show (Hearings, p. 2379), for the Michigan Sugar Co., $3.48 a hundred; for the Great Western Sugar Co., $3.43 per hundred; for the Billings Sugar Co., $3.49 a hundred; for the Scottsbluff Sugar Co., $3.85; for the Amalgamated, $3.05; for the Lewiston, $3.03; for the Utah-Idaho, $3.53; for the Alameda, $4.32; for the Spreckels, $2.70; for the Menominee, $4.39; for the Continental, $4.08; for the Iowa, $5.14; for the Carver County, $5.75. When the production of each of these factories is considered (Hearings, p. 100), the average cost is found to be 3.54 cents per pound.

Let us turn to the cane situation. It seems that some territory best adapted to the cultivation of sugar cane produces raw cane sugar at a cost of about 1½ cents per pound, and it must not be forgotten in this connection that cane sugar brings, when refined, a slightly higher price than beet sugar in our markets in open competition with beet sugar.

The celebrated Dutch sugar expert, Mr. Prinsen-Geerligs, stated in 1908 (Hearings, p. 2797) that Java was rapidly conquering the sugar market of the Orient and could make raw sugar at 1½ cents per pound. This same authority is responsible for the statement that with modern methods the Philippine Islands "can do much better than Java."

Mr. Walker, the Philippine sugar expert, in a report recently made to the Philippine Government, states that 84 per cent raw cane sugar is being produced at Negros, P. I., at a cost, including transportation to Iloilo, of three-quarters of a cent per pound. (Hearings, p. 2798.) Reduced to a basis of 96° sugar, this would represent a production cost of 1½ cents per pound.

From the testimony of Mr. James H. Post, president of the National and treasurer of the Cuban-American Sugar Co., raw cane sugar is produced in Cuba at 2 cents per pound (Hearings, p. 515) and can be produced at a lower cost than this.

On the other hand, the sugar planters of Louisiana contend that they can not produce raw cane sugar at a cost of less than 3½ cents per pound. (Hearings, p. 1781.) The cost of refining raw cane sugar in the United States is probably about one-half cent per pound. (Hearings, pp. 140, 209, 541, 1149, 1150, and 2260.)

To the cost per pound of raw cane sugar, in each instance given above, should be added the cost of refining whenever comparison is sought to be made between refined cane sugar and refined beet sugar. This cost of refining cane sugar appears to be about one-half cent per pound in this country. (Hearings, pp. 140, 209, 540, and 2260.)

OVERCAPITALIZATION.

The original combination among the sugar refiners, organized in 1887, and known as the Sugar Refineries Co., was capitalized at $50,000,000, though it was agreed that 15 per cent of the stock, or seven and a half millions, par value, should be reserved as "treasury stock."

This stock was actually issued to the various corporations forming the refineries company, in accordance with the statement immediately following that was furnished to your committee on October 3, 1911, by the American Sugar Refining Co.

The companies going into the combination and the amount of certificates of stock which they received from the Sugar Refineries Co., after deducting the 15 per cent, was as follows:

Havemeyer & Elder Sugar Refining Co.....	$14,322,500
Brooklyn Sugar Refining Co.....	3,612,500
De Castro & Donner Sugar Refining Co.....	2,677,500
Matthiessen & Wiechers Sugar Refining Co.....	5,525,000
Havemeyer Sugar Refining Co.....	4,675,000
Dick & Meyer Co.....	2,550,000
Moller & Sierck Co.....	912,500
Oxnard Bros. Co.....	637,500
Standard Sugar Refining Co.....	2,295,000
Boston Sugar Refining Co.....	1,657,500
Ray State Sugar Refining Co.....	892,500
Continental Sugar Refining Co.....	765,000
St. Louis Sugar Refining Co.....	755,000

Louisiana Sugar Refining Co.	$922,500
Planters' Sugar Refining Co.	837,500
Forest City Sugar Refining Co.	325,000

Making a total of..... 43,362,500
 Stock sold to make improvements upon several companies and a stock dividend of 8 per cent afterwards declared..... 3,649,000

Making a total of..... 47,011,500

There was also apparently purchased out of this authorized issue of $50,000,000, either by an exchange of stock or in cash, the American Sugar Refining Co. (the San Francisco company), at $1,500,000, North River Sugar Refining Co., $595,000, and organization expenses, $750,000; unissued, $143,500; total, $50,000,000.

John E. Searles bought the North River Sugar Refining Co. for $325,000, and it went into the Refiners' Trust at an agreed valuation of $700,000, less 15 per cent of treasury stock to be reserved, or $595,000 net. (Testimony of George H. Moller and John E. Searles, in case of N. Y. v. North River Sugar Refining Co., 121 N. Y. Court of Appeals, 502.)

The Bay State, a corporation with a capital of about $450,000, went in at a valuation of something over $900,000 (Hearings, p. 5), exactly at $1,050,000 gross, or at $892,500 net. (Fifteen per cent treasury stock reserved, according to above statement.)

Oxnard Bros. sold a refinery to the combination that had not cost them more than $200,000 for $750,000, which, with the 15 per cent deducted, netted them $637,500 in trust certificates. (Hearings, p. 371.)

Havemeyer & Elder Sugar Refining Co. and De Castro & Donner Sugar Refining Co., of both of which Mr. Henry O. Havemeyer was president, and in which companies the stockholders were identical, went into the "trust" at a combined valuation of twenty millions, from which 15 per cent, or three millions, were deducted.

The Brooklyn Sugar Refining Co. went into the combination at an agreed gross valuation of more than $4,000,000 (net, with 15 per cent deducted, $3,612,500), but the present valuation placed by the American Sugar Refining Co. on the physical properties of the three last-named companies, which went in at a combined valuation of $24,000,000, is but $12,000,000, although the real estate of these concerns has enhanced enormously in value since 1887 and the refinery has been improved and enlarged, being the largest and best refinery of the American, at great expense.

Your committee confidently submits from the above instances that its estimate in an earlier part of this report that of the nominal $50,000,000 of capital of the old refineries company not over twenty to twenty-five millions was real value, the balance being "water."

The capital of the American Co., organized in 1891, was also $50,000,000, half common and half preferred. It appears to have taken over the properties of the Sugar Refineries Co. at a ratio of par, or somewhere near that figure. At par, according to the testimony of Mr. Helke. (Hearings, p. 187.) At something a little less than that figure, according to Mr. Atkins (hearings, p. 118), issuing, pro rata, about $42,000,000 of its stock in place of the $47,000,000 actually issued by the refineries company.

So that the American inherited from its predecessor, the Sugar Refineries Co., must, if not all, of the water that had been so liberally pumped into the stock of the latter company.

In 1892 the American increased its capital stock from fifty to seventy-five millions, using the increase to purchase its Philadelphia and Baltimore competitors, as already outlined in this report.

It paid, in stock, $10,000,000 for the Spreckels' plan that had cost only four and a half millions in cash. (Hearings, p. 2347.)

The Franklin, that was not worth over $5,000,000 at the outside, and probably less (hearings, pp. 1377-1378), was bought for $10,000,000 in stock. It is worthy of note that at the time of these transactions, or during the same year at least, common stock of the American sold as high as 114 and preferred as high as 107. So it appears that up to its $75,000,000 capital mark the American Co. easily maintained its inherited ratio of two dollars of stock to one of real value.

So far as we have been able to discover, the further increase of stock of the American in 1901 from seventy-five to ninety millions was not marked by anything like the same degree of overpayment by the American. The mania for overcapitalization seems to permeate the sugar industry in every direction. The American, with its stock originally 40 to 50 per cent water, has paid the following dividends since its organization.

On preferred stock (one-half of whole) 7 per cent from 1891 to date. (Hearings, p. 2523.)

	Per cent.
1891	8
1892	9
1893	23
1894-1899	12
1900	0 1/2

In other words, from 1891 to date the preferred has paid 7 per cent and the common has averaged 9.4 per cent, or both have averaged 8.2 per cent on the whole stock issue—at least 15 per cent to 16 per cent on a fair valuation of the properties and business.

Now, take the two largest competitors of the American—Arbuckle Bros. and the Federal.

1. Arbuckle Bros. Mr. John Arbuckle testified that his firm had about $2,000,000 invested in the sugar business (Hearings, p. 2309), and yet his firm refines 8.7 per cent of the sugar consumed in the United States (Hearings, p. 43).

Even if it be considered that the American, directly and indirectly, controls about 63 per cent, as pointed out in another part of this report, instead of 42.14 per cent, as claimed by that company, then Arbuckle Bros. refine more than one-eighth of the amount refined by the American, and their profits ought to be equivalent to an 8 per cent return on a capital of $11,250,000, or at least 40 per cent per annum on their actual investment.

2. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. It has the following capital stock: Preferred stock, $3,322,680; common stock, $6,677,320. (Hearings, p. 2521.)

The actual amount originally invested in the refinery was from three to three and one-half millions, the proceeds of the sale of the preferred stock (Hearings, p. 2219), common stock being issued entirely as a bonus. Since then the profits of the business have been invested in the enlargement and improvement of the plant until from six to seven millions are invested therein. (Hearings, p. 2360.) The preferred stock has paid 6 per cent interest from the beginning, and up to the close of this hearing no dividend had ever been declared on the common stock; the policy of the company being to put the profits back in the business. (Hearings, p. 2220.)

The preferred, at the close of our hearings, sold for about 95 or 96 (it was originally sold at 95) and the common about 45. In other words, in eight years of operation it has paid 6 per cent on the actual investment and almost doubled the investment.

Nor have the beet factories, as already stated, escaped overcapitalization. Mr. Oxnard's estimate of the cost of equipping a first-class beet factory was $1,000 per ton of daily slicing capacity. (Hearings, p. 376.) He finally increased that estimate by 25 per cent to include all the latest improvements and processes. (Hearings, p. 380.) Mr. Hathaway, of the Michigan Sugar Co., also estimated it at $1,000 per ton; but Mr. Warren, of the same company, fixed it at $1,500 per ton where the latest improved machinery was included. (Hearings, pp. 736, 747.) Mr. Morey estimated it at $1,500 per ton (Hearings, p. 908) and Mr. Nibley at $1,000 per ton. Taking the mean between the two extremes of these estimates, which takes us exactly to Mr. Oxnard's revised figures and places it at $1,250 per ton, and what do we find? The beet companies combined have a daily slicing capacity of 48,650 tons. (Hearings, p. 1690.) Multiply that figure by $1,250 and we have $60,712,500; but these beet companies are capitalized at more than $104,000,000. (Hearings, pp. 368 and 1890.)

STOCK JOBBING BY "INSIDERS."

We have already pointed out how the properties of Havemeyer & Elder and of De Castro & Donner went into the Sugar Refiners' Trust of 1887 at a valuation of twenty millions, though, even to-day, after the property has been much improved, the Brooklyn Sugar Refinery added thereto large sums spent for its enlargement, and its real estate enormously enhanced in value, it is not worth more than twelve millions, even according to the physical valuations of the American Co. When to the twenty millions allowed for the two companies above named are added four millions for the Brooklyn, it will be readily seen that Mr. Henry O. Havemeyer, who organized the trust and who dominated it up to his death, in December, 1907, must have gotten at least three for one for the property he put into the original combination, and must have put several millions of clear profit into his own pocket at the very beginning of its organization.

In 1892 the American purchased the Spreckels Sugar Refining Co., of Philadelphia, paying for the property that had cost and was worth only about four and one-half millions, ten millions in stock that was undoubtedly sold for considerably above par.

Shortly before the American made this purchase Henry O. Havemeyer, its president and one of its directors, and T. A. Havemeyer and John E. Searles, officers and directors of the American, bought at par, individually, from Mr. C. A. Spreckels (the elder) 45 per cent of the stock of the Spreckels Co. for $2,250,000; Mr. H. O. Havemeyer taking three-eighths of the above amount, or $843,750; Mr. T. A. Havemeyer, the same amount, $843,750; and Mr. John E. Searles, $562,500. (Hearings, p. 2203.) Within six or seven months these officers of the American more than doubled this money by selling their own company, at two for one, the stock they thus acquired, receiving therefor stock in the American that sold for at least 106 for preferred and 114 for common per share.

It is hardly possible that either of the Havemeyers cleared less than a million dollars, or Searles less than three-quarters of a million, on this transaction, which appears to have cost the American and its "outside" stockholders several millions more than it should have cost.

During the same year, 1892, the American bought out the Franklin Sugar Refining Co., of Philadelphia, paying for that concern, that had not cost and was not worth more than five millions at the very outside, ten millions in stock of the American, worth more than par, as already stated.

It seems, however, that before this trade was made, Henry O. Havemeyer individually contracted with Charles C. Harrison, acting for the Franklin, to take over from Harrison and his associates one-half of the common and one-half of the preferred stock that Harrison and his associates were to receive from the American Sugar Co., at 80 per share, both for common and preferred. Mr. Havemeyer bought American stock (one-half preferred and one-half common) of the par value of five millions for four millions cash.

For the year 1892 the preferred stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. paid a 7 per cent dividend and the common a dividend of 9 per cent and 23 per cent for 1893, and during the same year, 1892, common sold as high as 106 and preferred as high as 114. It is therefore probable that Mr. Havemeyer individually cleared rather more than a million dollars on this single transaction. While it is true that Mr. Havemeyer "retired from the meeting" when these Philadelphia transactions were consummated by the American's board of directors, stating that he was personally interested (hearings, p. 2346), yet it is not probable that his influence was absent or that his fellow directors fully understood the magnitude of his personal interests, for on September 14, 1894, we find them resolving to agree to Havemeyer's offer to accept $100,000 "for extraordinary services rendered by H. O. Havemeyer from and including the purchase of the Philadelphia and other refineries to date," and directing the treasurer "to pay him that amount, taking his receipt in full" (hearings, p. 2926).

Your committee believe that the powers exercised by the directors of this monopoly (as it was practically then) are too great to be exercised in practical secrecy by a very few men without supervision or publicity. If the Philadelphia refineries could only have been acquired on fair business terms after an honest appraisal, would the Philadelphia owners have sold? Would the president of the American Sugar Refinery and his board of directors have been so anxious to buy? Would the capital stock of the company have been loaded with the $10,000,000 of bonus which went to the parties participant? Would the American Sugar Refining Co. have swelled to such menacing proportions? Would public suspicion have been aroused? Would the price of sugar have been so well maintained at all times? Would speculations in sugar stock in the market have been made so interesting to persons knowing nothing of the sugar business? In short, would there be in the United States so many and so big trusts if the neglect of the Government to assert its authority did not give free hand to the overcapitalization of business enterprises and the subsequent unloading on the investing public?

In 1900 James H. Post, acting for and in conjunction with Henry O. Havemeyer and the American, organized four competing sugar refineries located in and near New York City into the National Sugar Refining Co. The latter company was capitalized at $20,000,000, $10,000,000 common and $10,000,000 preferred. The $10,000,000 preferred possibly represented value of some kind, though it seems that a considerable margin was allowed to the corporations who formed it above real value.

They were paid in preferred stock of the National, of which the American agreed to buy a little more than a majority—something over $5,000,000—thus giving to the combining corporations a little over half cash, which was just about the true cash value of the plants, and the balance, slightly under half, in preferred stock of the National, the latter stock representing the profits of those who went into the combination. The testimony tends to show that common stock, $10,000,000, was promoter's stock, and was issued to—

Henry O. Havemeyer and family	$7,600,000
Lowell M. Palmer	1,000,000
James H. Post	500,000
Washington B. Thomas	500,000
John E. Parsons	400,000

Havemeyer soon acquired all of the above either by purchase or by volunteer surrender, except the interest of Post, who still claims his share. All of the above men, except Post, were at the time officers and directors of the American.

The above are the most glaring instances disclosed by our record, in which the trusted officers of a great corporation first wronged the public by overcapitalizing the great enterprises over which they preside, and then demanding "reasonable profits" on such inflated capitalization, have turned around and wronged the corporation itself by taking for themselves as individuals profits and advantages that they ought to have secured for the corporations of which they were the agents and trustees.

"UNLOADING" ON THE INVESTING PUBLIC.

From the inception of the scheme which resulted first in the formation of the refineries company in 1887, and then in the organization of the American in 1891, up to his death in December, 1907, Henry O. Havemeyer was the dominant and dominating figure of the combination. As has already been shown, the two companies in which he was interested and of which he was the principal owner got the lion's share of the trustees' certificates of the refineries company, 17 millions. Throughout the life of the refineries company, and of the American, he dealt in its stock in large blocks, buying, as we have already shown, 5 millions of it in one transaction, when the Franklin was purchased from Harrison and his associates in 1892. And yet, from the very day of the organization of the refineries trust in 1887, he seems to have sold the trust certificates to the public as rapidly as possible and he does not seem to have owned any considerable block of the American stock for any length of time (Hearings, pp. 221-224), and at the time of his death, according to the testimony of the secretary of the company, he owned individually only 834 shares (Hearings, p. 224), the ownership of his entire family being about 2,000 shares.

According to the inventory of his estate he owned, at the time of his death, 321 shares of American common stock and 136 shares of American preferred stock. (Hearings, p. 2512.) This ownership was well described by the former secretary of the American as "a merely nominal amount." "Enough stock to qualify (as director) and that was all that was needed." (Hearings, p. 221.) The policy of selling out the stock as fast as possible seems to have been adopted by all of the parties that went into the combination, with one exception; for instance, Oxnard Bros. sold as quickly as possible. (Hearings, p. 371.) So did Atkins of the Bay State. (Hearings, p. 18.)

The exception to this rule seems to be the Thomas family of Boston, now the largest stockholders in the American, owning between one and a half and two million dollars' worth of the stock. (Hearings, p. 2155.)

Mr. Charles R. Helke, for many years secretary of the American, tersely describes the situation in the following paragraph, which we quote from his testimony (Hearings, p. 222):

"It began almost from the very beginning. Let me tell you about it. When stock was issued in 1887 I gave certificates to each stockholder, and there were about 200 in all in the beginning. The larger number were in the New England States. These three or four refineries in Boston had more stockholders than all the others together. At that time in New York men would buy railroad stocks and railroad bonds and United States and city bonds, but not stocks in industrial corporations. In the New England States, however, they had mills and manufacturing plants the stock of which was bought by the people, and as soon as the property was organized stock would be sold by the Havemeyers. It was exchanged, and the numbers have been increasing since. It is a strange part of this remarkable corporation, as it is, that there are 19,000 stockholders."

How thoroughly the unloading process has been accomplished is also well indicated by the following table of stockholders furnished by Mr. Atkins, chairman of the board of directors of the American. (Hearings, p. 45.)

In considering this question one series of salient facts deserves to be borne constantly in mind:

That in its formative period, more than 20 years ago, and at intervals during the next 15 years, sugar-producing plants were brought into the combination at valuations which gave great individual fortunes to the promoters and at the same time put upon the market stock representing huge inflations, and of a face value of $90,000,000.

That in process of time the few practical sugar producers who formed the corporation generally sold their stock in the market to people who took it from stock-market estimates and not because of any connection with or knowledge of the business of producing refined sugar.

That by this process a few large stockholders, probably less than 50 in all, have been replaced by 19,000 people, of whom not over a dozen have any practical knowledge of the business of producing refined sugar. About 10,000 of these 19,000 stockholders are women. The whole body of stockholders are scattered throughout 43 States and 16 foreign countries, and the average holding of stock of each amounts to $4,900 par value.

That the great majority of these stockholders acquired their shares at a price of from $120 to $130 for each share of $100 par, that this share had cost the original promoters not over $50, and that the assets resulting from 20 years of prosperous business are so large as to justify the conclusion that there is property enough behind each share of the stock at the present time to equal the price paid for it by the present holders. (Testimony, pp. 2042, 2061.)

That since the death of Henry O. Havemeyer, about four years ago, and the accession of the present stockholders to control, the affairs of this company have for the first time been conducted with a fair approximation to that publicity which should accompany the administration of a company which controls so much of a great commodity.

These salient facts indicate with supreme emphasis the basic condition of the problem uncovered by this committee: That we have in this Government ample machinery for rigid inquiry into the property of these 18,000 people and for suits to decompose that property into its original parts by the destruction of its organization; but there is no arrangement of Government whatever whereby any one of these 18,000 people might have informed himself definitely of the hazards into which he or she was buying. A dozen men may put off onto 18,000 a colossal speculative enterprise, into the fabric of which is woven all sorts of trade devices under suspicion before the law, and the first opportunity any one of the 18,000 has to know of this is when the court has been asked to act. That this colossal speculation has come through with success and to-day stands on an established business basis is due to the genius of its architect rather than to any of the restraining powers of society as expressed in law.

To summarize this portion of our report, we find strikingly developed in the sugar industry several evils, aside from the primary one of stifling competition, which seem to demand careful consideration and remedial legislation by Congress.

1. Original overcapitalization of great industrial corporations, resulting in increased cost of production, if a profit is to be made (as is always insisted upon) on the inflated capitalization, and higher prices of the product to the consuming public.

2. The temptation of the persons who organize and control these large corporations to earn dividends on watered stock as soon as possible, so that such stock may be unloaded in the open markets upon the investing public. These dividends can rarely, if ever, be made without increasing prices to the consumer.

3. Exploitation not only of the consuming public and of the investing public, as already set out, but also of the corporations themselves, by their officers, directors, and trustees, who do not hesitate to overburden the consumer, to deceive the investor, and to take advantage of the corporations that have trusted them, whenever it will line the pockets of such individual trustees.

CONCLUSION.

While fully admitting the forcefulness of the argument in favor of the conduct of the large industries of the countries by powerful and efficient agencies that can fully develop and apply the economies of cooperation, yet your committee finds itself unable to subscribe to the doctrine that the Government had just as well recognize that competition must give place to monopolistic combinations and proceed to legitimize and regulate the great trusts.

It may be quite true that large industrial combinations could produce more cheaply than smaller and competing concerns; but as the presence of competition is of itself the chief incentive to cheaper production, so it seems to us that the absence of competition is of itself an invitation to sloth, to lax methods, to more expensive production than more than counterbalances the advantages resulting from cooperation. Large trusts, if they produce more cheaply, could sell more cheaply than smaller and competing concerns, but that they would, unless forced by law to do so, is inconceivable.

To undertake to force them by law to treat the consumer fairly and charge him only a reasonable price is, then, the only condition upon which their continued existence can be contemplated; and yet to adopt that course, to fix the price of commodities by law, whether by commissions or by other method, would clothe the Government with dangerous power, rob the citizen of individuality, and embark the Nation into extreme paternalism. Competition and individuality are the great remedies that have been sufficient through all the ages to protect us from the evils that now threaten. We are not yet ready to write an epitaph over either.

The Sherman law ought to be rigidly and impartially enforced. It ought, in our judgment, to be supplemented by legislation that will make its provisions definite and certain, protect the consumer and investor from the evils of overcapitalization, and guarantee corporations from exploitation by their trusted officers and agents for their individual benefit and profit.

As this matter belongs to the jurisdiction of a great standing committee of the House, your special committee will not, as a committee, undertake to present a bill upon the subject, or to further elaborate the idea herein suggested, being confident that the entire subject matter will receive careful and prompt consideration by the standing committee having jurisdiction thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be entered in the Journal and ordered printed.

There was no objection.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

[Telegram.]

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,

Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States has passed a measure known as the Underwood bill, materially reducing the duty on foreign lead and zinc ores and lead and zinc bullion, etc., imported into this country; and

Whereas if aforesaid bill becomes a law it will seriously affect the industry of these metals in this country by pitting the extraordinarily cheap mining labor of Spain and Mexico against the well-paid mining labor of the United States, thereby not only threatening the lead and zinc industry as a whole with a period of inactivity, but depriving thousands of miners of employment, menacing entire communities now contented and happy with stagnation and disruption, destroying local transportation systems, property values, and menacing schools and churches, cutting off the demand for machinery and supplies, and inviting the evil spirit of want for the necessities of life and home: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Northwest Mining Convention, representing the States of Washington, Oregon, Montana, Idaho, California, Arizona, and Utah, duly assembled in Spokane, State of Washington, on the 16th day of February, 1912, most respectfully protests without reserve to the United States Senate against the passage of the so-called Underwood bill or any other bill having for its purpose a reduction of the existing tariff on lead or zinc ores or lead and zinc bullion, etc.; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge our Representatives and Senators in Congress to do their utmost to defeat the proposed tariff legislation in regard to lead and zinc as a vital necessity for the preservation of these industries and the homes and employment of many thousands of miners and incidental laborers; further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be wired to the respective Senators and Representatives of the States in this convention assembled.

Adopted February 16 by Northwest Mining Convention.

A joint resolution relating to the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Resolved by the house of delegates (the senate concurring), That—
Whereas the United States Government, pursuant to the request of the State of Virginia, has established a quarantine station for the Chesapeake Bay ports, with a view to protecting the State at large and especially the cities of Norfolk, Portsmouth, and Newport News; and
Whereas the Commonwealth of Virginia has demonstrated its confidence in the Federal Government through the action of the governor in abrogating the Newport News and Elizabeth River quarantine; and
Whereas the widespread prevalence of the Asiatic cholera in southern Europe, the constant spread of the bubonic plague, and the rapid growth of commerce between Virginia ports and ports infected with these diseases have rendered the present equipment of the United States quarantine station in Virginia inadequate; and
Whereas the opening of the Panama Canal, in the judgment of the general assembly, will result in greatly increased commerce to Hampton Roads, with a resulting necessity for a larger and more efficient quarantine and inspection service: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of Virginia in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, severally requested to use their efforts toward securing from the Federal Government an adequate appropriation for the immediate construction of an efficient boarding and disinfecting plant for the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in Virginia; be it

Resolved further, That the general assembly hereby heartily indorses and requests the cooperation of the Virginia Representatives in the Congress of the United States in securing the passage of Senate bill 2117, of which the Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN is patron, entitled "A bill to promote the efficiency of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service."

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of delegates and the clerk of the Senate be directed to forthwith certify copies of this joint resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives from Virginia in the Congress of the United States.

Agreed to by the house of delegates February 9, 1912.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. JONES. On behalf of a minority of the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I desire to submit the views of the minority in the case involving the title to the seat of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator from the State of Wisconsin. I ask that the views of the minority may be printed in the RECORD, and also that the same number of copies may be printed of the views as were ordered printed of the majority report.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington presents the views of the minority from the Committee on Privileges and Elections and asks that they be printed in the Record and as a document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. In connection therewith I desire to submit the following resolution, to be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington submits a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 223), as follows:

Resolved, That ISAAC STEPHENSON was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to hear the report read, if it is not too long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington desires to have the resolution printed and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the report is not too long, I should like to have it read. I will ask the Senator if it is a very long report.

Mr. JONES. The report is tolerably long, considering the extracts from the testimony. Outside of that the report is not very long.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what was the final action taken upon the minority report offered by the Senator from Washington. It seemed rather indefinite in my mind as to just what happened to it.

Mr. JONES. It was presented, and the request was made that it be printed in the Record, and also that an equal number of copies be printed as a document as were printed of the majority report.

Mr. HEYBURN. Printed as a Senate document?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I suppose so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair imagines as part 2 of the report of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is where the embarrassment arose. It did not come in as was suggested last week. It was necessary to go forward with the printing of the testimony with the other papers that accompanied it, because otherwise if we had held them over it would have taken two or three days' extra time to print them. I merely want to call the attention of Senators to it. The minority report came in so late that we could not, in justice to the public business, hold back the printing of the testimony. That is the reason why this will come in now just as a minority report, as in the former case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will come in as part 2, separately printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was not designated as part 2 in the former case. It was simply the minority report that was made in the case that we considered before. It was merely a separate document. I do not want to have to reopen the index and hold it up.

Mr. JONES. That I do not desire.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want a candid understanding about it.

Mr. JONES. We put in the report just as quickly as we could prepare it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The views of the minority (S. Rept. 349, pt. 2), submitted by Mr. JONES, are as follows:

CHARGES RELATIVE TO THE ELECTION OF ISAAC STEPHENSON.

Mr. JONES (for himself, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. KENTON, Mr. KERN, and Mr. LEA), from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following views of the minority to accompany Senate resolution 136:

In the primary election at which Mr. STEPHENSON was nominated for Senator pursuant to the Wisconsin law, the candidates expended the following sums:

Neal Brown	$1,075.87
Francis E. McGovern	11,063.88
William H. Hatton	26,413.00
S. A. Cook	42,293.29
Senator STEPHENSON	107,793.05

In all, about $225,000 on the part of candidates for the Senate alone. Referring to these expenditures, the majority report says:

"The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatton, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of propriety as to justify the sharpest criticism. Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of electors by the candidate."

We concur in this statement, and it justifies us in opposing the conclusion of the majority. How a seat in the Senate can be secured "in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government," with the evidence showing the use of such a large sum of money, and not be tainted by corrupt methods and practices we are unable to comprehend. The question now squarely before the Senate is whether or not methods and practices "in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government" shall be denounced by our words and approved by our votes.

The majority report also says:

"Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate were conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State."

This statement we indorse. It warrants our opposition to the conclusion of the majority. If it would be difficult to justify a campaign like this by a candidate for a State office, why is it not equally difficult to justify it on the part of Senator STEPHENSON? He was not compelled to go into the primary. He elected to do so, and he should be held to the same degree of accountability as any other candidate in that primary.

If he used methods—and the majority says he did—that it would be difficult to justify in behalf of a State candidate, then it is equally difficult for the Senate to justify such conduct on the part of a candidate for a seat in this body and preserve its integrity and honor. In our judgment it can not do it.

ADMITTED FACTS.

The following may be taken as admitted facts in this case: Three men were selected as managers by Senator STEPHENSON; money was placed in their hands from time to time as called for to the amount of over $107,000; they were not asked how they expended it, nor for what purpose; no accounting was requested; they paid it out in various sums to different individuals in different wards, precincts, and counties; large sums were paid to different individuals holding official positions, and to individuals recognized to be leaders, and to others of prominence in different organizations; no directions were given to these men how the money should be expended; no reports were required and no knowledge obtained as to how they spent the money or for what purpose; men were hired for the ostensible purpose of going over the country talking STEPHENSON and creating STEPHENSON sentiment; men, whose occupations led them into different sections of the country, were paid large sums of money for talking for STEPHENSON on their travels; men were paid three, five, and ten dollars per day to be at the polls on election day, or to haul voters to the polls; large sums were paid leaders in different wards and precincts to look after their wards and precincts; hundreds of dollars were spent for treating to cigars, liquors, meals, etc., as much as $135 in one day by one man; money was paid to candidates for the legislature, at least three of whom were nominated and elected; detailed expenditures were not kept; memoranda were destroyed; records and papers concerning the campaign were shifted from one place to another; mysterious methods and roundabout ways were employed; original records were destroyed; items and amounts were grouped in such a way as to give no knowledge to the public except the amount of each class of expenditures; a banker acted as treasurer; no account was opened as is usually done by depositors; remittances were received, private memoranda kept, cash disbursements of funds made, but no record was kept on the bank's books, and when the committee of the general assembly started to investigate local counsel for Mr. STEPHENSON had such records and correspondence as had not already been destroyed moved out of the State, for the purpose to keeping them beyond the jurisdiction of the general assembly.

All this is admitted, and we feel that we have a right to assume from these admitted facts and actions that corrupt methods and practices were used in connection with said primary election. To hold otherwise is to establish a precedent that would authorize an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars to debauch the electorate in order to secure a seat in this body. To do this is to notify the world that we are careless as to whether or not seats in this body are to be bought and sold as so much merchandise to the man with the largest purse. To do so is to say to the man of millions eager for place, power, and honor, "Spend as much of your millions as you please to secure a seat here and no question will be made if you claim it was expended within the law." As was said by Senator Hoar and Senator Frye in regard to the facts before them in the Payne case, "No more fatal blow can be struck at the Senate or at the purity and permanence of the republican Government itself than the establishment of this precedent."

The expenditure of such a sum of money at a primary election on behalf of one candidate in itself shocks the judgment and conscience of honest men generally, and disbursed as disclosed by the record in this case is conclusive of corrupt methods and practices.

THE PRIMARY.

The power to inquire into the practices and methods employed in the primary election is questioned. The majority in this case find that we have this power, and with that conclusion we agree. In this we are fully sustained by principle and precedent, and by the terms of the resolution under which the committee acted, which authorized and directed the committee "to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, and report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin there were used corrupt methods and practices." The charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin affected not only the election by the legislature itself, but also the primary election.

It appears by the record that several candidates for the legislature announced during their candidacy that, if elected, they would vote for the candidate for Senator receiving the highest vote at the primary. If the primary choice was secured by corrupt methods and practices, would not the vote in the legislature secured thereby be corrupt, however innocent the member casting it? Several members of the legislature announced when they voted for STEPHENSON that they did so solely because he was the primary choice. If the primary was carried by corrupt methods and practices, these votes were corrupt, though honestly cast, and if the Senate can not inquire into such corrupt methods and practices, then the power given to us to judge of elections of our Members is a mere shadow. That we have this power is in accord not only with reason and justice, but is sustained by precedent.

The case of Mr. Caldwell, found at page 429, Senate Election Cases, is in point. In this case an arrangement was made by Mr. Caldwell with Thomas Carney under which Mr. Carney agreed not to be a candidate for United States Senator before the Legislature of Kansas and should give his influence and support for Mr. Caldwell. Mr. Caldwell was to pay him $15,000. Mr. Carney was not a candidate before the legislature and did use his influence to secure the election of Mr. Caldwell. Was such an arrangement corrupt? The committee said:

"It was an attempt to buy the votes of the members of the legislature, not by bribing them directly, but through the manipulations of another. The purchase money was not to go to them, but to Mr. Carney, who was to sell and deliver them without their knowledge. That Mr. Caldwell did procure the votes of members of the legislature, friends of Mr. Carney, ignorant of the fact that Mr. Carney was making merchandise of his political character and influence and of their friendship for him, for which he was to receive a large sum of money, the evidence leaves no reasonable doubt.

"Buying off opposing candidates, and in that way securing the votes of all or the most of their friends, is in effect buying the office. It recognizes candidacy for office as a merchantable commodity—a thing having a money value—and is as destructive to the purity and freedom of elections as the direct bribery of members of the legislature."

When candidates for the legislature announce that they will vote for the choice of the primary for Senator, then to buy or corrupt the primary is to buy the member of the legislature; and if it was corrupt to buy off a candidate for the Senate and thereby secure the votes of his friends it is also corrupt to buy the primary and thereby secure the votes of those who announce that they will be controlled by the primary; and if the Senate can go outside of the proceedings of the legislature and investigate corruption in preventing men from being candidates for the Senate before the legislature, then it can certainly investigate methods and proceedings in the primary.

In the Payne case (Senate Election Cases, p. 711) three of the committee of seven say:

"We, in our conclusion, made no distinction between the use of fraud, corruption, or bribery in a caucus vote or in the legislative vote for a Senator. Although a caucus, or what proceeds in it, has no constitutional or legal relation to the election of a Senator, yet, by the habit of political parties, the stage of determination as to who is to be elected Senator, and the influences, proper or improper, that produce that determination, is that which precedes and is concluded in the caucus. So far as the question of personal delinquency or turpitude is concerned, no moral distinction should be made between corrupt proceedings in caucus and those in the legislature. How far any such distinction would need to be insisted upon in any case, on the question of unseating a Senator, where he himself was not affected with any personal misconduct or complicity with the misconduct of others, we have no occasion, in the immediate case or attitude of the subject, to consider or suggest."

Sensors Hoar and Frye, in the same case, in their minority views at page 715, say:

"If B, C, and D have promised to vote as A shall vote, if A be corrupted, four votes are gained by the process, although B, C, and D be innocent. In looking, therefore, to see whether an election by the legislature was procured or effected by bribery, it may be very important to discover whether that bribery procured the nomination of a caucus whose action a majority of the legislature were bound in honor to support."

JOHN W. STONE.

John W. Stone was State game warden and had many deputies acting under him. Their position gave them an influence they would not have as individuals, and their duties required them to travel over the State. It was desirable to have their active support. Senator STEPHENSON personally directed that $2,500 be turned over to Stone. This was done without any specific directions as to its use, and the money was distributed over the State where and in the manner that it was thought would do the most good. While this action may not be a direct violation of the letter of any State law, in our judgment it was a corrupt practice.

EXTRACTS FROM TESTIMONY.

We submit the following extracts from the testimony as illustrative of the methods and practices pursued in the distribution of this large sum of money for campaign purposes:

PRIMARY—STEPHENSON WOULD FIX NO LIMIT, BUT SAID GO ON AND CONDUCT THE CAMPAIGN, ETC.

Mr. EDMONDS. In my talk with Senator STEPHENSON I wanted to learn from him the amount of money he expected to expend. He seemed to think that too much money was being expended. I endeavored to have him fix an amount so that we would not exceed it. This he declined to do, and I endeavored to show him the difficulty of conducting a campaign without knowing how much I might be allowed to expend; but I was not able to get him to state, and he said to go on and conduct the campaign—"use your best ability in conducting it," and left it in that way.

SENATOR STEPHENSON.

Senator POMERENE. Did they advise you from time to time as to how they were expending this money?

Senator STEPHENSON. Not as a rule; no, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Did you ask for any report from them from time to time as to how they were expending this money?

Senator STEPHENSON. No, sir. I had confidence in Mr. Edmonds and Mr. Puelicher and my bankers, and I have yet.

Senator POMERENE. Referring to this letter of August 4, it was made known to you that to carry out Mr. Edmonds's plan he needed more money?

Senator STEPHENSON. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Did you at that time take up with him the matter as to the amount which you felt disposed to put into the campaign?

Senator STEPHENSON. I can not say as to that. We telephone some. I think I was in the headquarters only twice, and not to exceed an hour altogether during the entire campaign. I was not in Milwaukee but about three times.

Senator POMERENE. In other words, we are to understand, then, that you left the entire management of this campaign to your campaign managers, and about all you did was to furnish the sinews of war?

Senator STEPHENSON. Yes.

PAID TO STONE, GAME WARDEN, $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. We will pass that. Now, we come to another item, "Cash to J. W. Stone, $2,500." Who was Mr. Stone?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Stone was game warden of Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know him personally before the payment of this $2,500?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I had met him.

The CHAIRMAN. Or at the time?

Mr. EDMONDS. I had met him.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid him the money, did you not, in cash?

Mr. EDMONDS. Through my instructions.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not pay it to him in cash yourself?

Mr. EDMONDS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Who did?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Sacket says he did.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Sacket paid it in cash. Where did he get the cash? Did you give it to him?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; I did not have the cash.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Sacket had no cash in the campaign, did he?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Sacket could get the cashier's check from the bank.

The CHAIRMAN. He had to get it from you, or on your credit?

Mr. EDMONDS. Sure; I told them to give it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you did tell him to get it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see if we can get at a candid statement of the occasion of the payment of this $2,500 to the State game warden. You know all about it, do you not?

Mr. EDMONDS. About his getting the money.

The CHAIRMAN. You know all the details of that game-warden proposition, do you not?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter has been investigated in such a way as to fix it in your mind, has it not?

Mr. EDMONDS. It was not necessary, because I remembered the details.

The CHAIRMAN. Remembered it all?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir; there were some things I did not remember, but some details I remember.

The CHAIRMAN. I would hardly expect to receive a reply if you do not know in regard to Mr. Stone.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose was $2,500 paid to Mr. Stone?

Mr. EDMONDS. For the purpose of getting his assistance in helping to nominate Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of assistance?

Mr. EDMONDS. Such kind as he could give, in his best judgment.

STONE MONEY PAID UNDER AGREEMENT WITH STEPHENSON.

Senator SUTHERLAND. When was it you gave Mr. Stone the $2,500, before or after this conversation?

Mr. EDMONDS. After.

Senator SUTHERLAND. After?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is, I think the same day, as I recall.

Senator SUTHERLAND. How did you fix the amount of $2,500?

Mr. EDMONDS. My recollection is that either Senator STEPHENSON informed me or else Mr. Stone informed me that that was the amount to be paid him.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Which was it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not recall now.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Did you make the arrangement or did Mr. STEPHENSON make it?

Mr. EDMONDS. My present recollection is that Mr. STEPHENSON made the agreement with Mr. Stone; Mr. Stone had seen him.

Senator SUTHERLAND. For the $2,500?

Mr. EDMONDS. But as to just how far that went I am not positive now. I do not want to do Mr. STEPHENSON an injustice by saying that he made it if Mr. Stone reported that that was the amount agreed upon when we talked.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Then I understand you to say that you do not know why it was $2,500 rather than some other sum?

Mr. EDMONDS. Except that that was the amount that Mr. Stone thought was advisable to put in his hands; that he could use to advantage or because of the information received from Senator STEPHENSON; which I am not sure.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Did you not exercise any judgment yourself as to what amount should be paid?

Mr. EDMONDS. In that particular case; no, sir.

PRIMARY—MONEY TO MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATURE—GAME WARDEN STONE—STEPHENSON TOLD.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the instructions, and what was the transaction?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think Senator STEPHENSON telephoned me or sent word through Mr. Stone to give him $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. To give you $2,500?

Mr. EDMONDS. To give him $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. To give Stone $2,500?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For what did you give it to him?

Mr. EDMONDS. I did not give it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not?

Mr. EDMONDS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did Mr. Stone get the $2,500?

Mr. EDMONDS. I assume from the bank—a cashier's check.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you give him an order?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is my recollection, though I am not positive.

The CHAIRMAN. That you gave him an order on the bank?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think so. That may have been one of the $5,000 items. I have not seen my check book for two years.

GAME WARDEN STONE GOT $2,500 BY DIRECTION OF STEPHENSON; WAS TO USE AT OWN ELECTION.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it to be expended by you, or were you authorized to pay it out to others, to be expended by them?

Mr. STONE. I was to use it at my own discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you at liberty, then, as you understood the transaction, to handle all that money yourself?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. According to your discretion?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. No limitations were placed upon you, whatever, as to the manner of expenditure, were there?

Mr. STONE. No; I think not.

MANAGER EDMONDS'S DESCRIPTION OF "ORGANIZATION" METHODS.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what do you mean by "organize" when you use the term in connection with the payment of this money?

Mr. EDMONDS. I mean that the man employed by me to look after Dane County and get out the vote—the largest possible vote—for Senator STEPHENSON was given latitude, usually guided by his judgment alone, as to what was to be done (p. 77).

The CHAIRMAN. Particularize the word "organize" and tell me what constituted organization.

Mr. EDMONDS. My idea in a county that was thoroughly organized would be in the first place to get out the advertising that we sent to the county—have it fully distributed and posted, and after that was done he was to put in his full time going around the county, and he was paid for his services going around the county and interesting men of influence in the different localities to interest their friends so as to get out a full vote for Senator STEPHENSON election day. In some instances still further organizing, if in their judgment that was wise, by getting out the vote, by hiring teams, etc., for getting men to the polls (p. 78).

PURPOSE FOR WHICH MONEY WAS PAID.

The CHAIRMAN. The second charge is as follows:

"That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, prior to said primary, pay to said Edmonds, above mentioned, sums with the design that said Edmonds should pay to other electors of this State, out of said sums above mentioned and other sums of money received by said Edmonds from said ISAAC STEPHENSON, prior to said primary, sums ranging from $5 per day to $1,000, in bulk, as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to said primary by said electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON as such candidate, in violation of said section."

Is that statement true?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Wherein is it not true?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is a pretty long statement. One of the things that appeals to me as not being true is that neither of those sums is in violation of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Then we will waive that last statement, "in violation of said section." Did he give you those sums, or any of them, to pay to other electors of the State?

Mr. EDMONDS. To other electors of the State?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I should say that he understood that in his payment of the money.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the statement of facts, aside from the final clause, "in violation of said section," is substantially correct, is it?

Mr. EDMONDS. There are a good many items in there enumerated, but I should say it is substantially correct.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You have had charge of large expenditures of money, have you, in a business way?

Mr. EDMONDS. Quite large; yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You have employed many agents whose duty it was to expend money?

Mr. EDMONDS. In some instances; yes, sir. Usually, however, in the management of a business, the work is done from the office, and the management of such business as I conducted was done by me, in the expenditure of money.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Is it in accordance with your business training and experience and habits to hand over to your agent a large sum of money, $500 or $1,000, and have him expend it without keeping an account of what he expends it for, or without having him render an account to you of the expenditures?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think so.

Senator SUTHERLAND. That is not in accordance with business methods, at any rate?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Was there any reason why you could not request these various political agents to keep an account of their expenditures?

Mr. EDMONDS. The only reason I could give is that I have never heard of it being done. Custom, I should say, governed that.

NO MEMORANDA AS TO MONEY PAID.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Who should know, under the system that obtained in the headquarters?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Sacket should know.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any memoranda when you gave instructions for the payment of money to these various people, or any of them, as to the services they were to perform in consideration of receiving this money?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir; no written statement; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you did not?

Mr. EDMONDS. No written statement; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any memoranda at any time in regard to the purposes for which the money you ordered paid was to be used?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not recall any.

The CHAIRMAN. Endeavor to recall it now, Mr. Edmonds.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir; I will.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you recall any instance in which you made a memorandum as to the purpose for which the money was paid, either by you or under your instructions, during this campaign?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not recall any instance; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no books of account in which such items will appear?

Mr. EDMONDS. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. You made no record either in a book or otherwise as to the purpose for which you paid or directed that money to be paid during the campaign?

Mr. EDMONDS. To the very best of my recollection, none.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you not?

Mr. EDMONDS. I did not feel it was necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you acquainted with the provisions of the statutes of the State of Wisconsin with reference to the filing of an expense account by those who were candidates for nomination or election?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I think so; reasonably well.

The CHAIRMAN. Are we to understand that with that knowledge you did not make any attempt to lay the foundation for compliance with that law in the expenditure or payment of the large sums of money that you disbursed during the campaign?

Mr. EDMONDS. I did not, because it was done by another person in the office.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Sacket.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose it transpired that it was not done by Mr. Sacket, then did Mr. Sacket disobey any instructions which you had given?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir; Mr. Sacket had his instructions from others before I came and took charge.

The CHAIRMAN. You were the manager of the campaign, were you not? That was the term used as to yourself?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is the term that has been given me; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the designation at that time, was it not?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you regard yourself in that respect?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I regarded myself as manager of the campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. And so regarding yourself, you made no attempt to lay the foundation for making a statement that would comply with the law in the event it became necessary to file an expense account?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir. Owing to the conditions that existed when I went there, I felt that that was being done and so continued during my service.

$100 SENT TO A NEWSPAPER MAN AT WAUSAU.

The CHAIRMAN. I will so mark it. The next item is $100 to J. L. Sturtevant. That is said to be for "advertising." What advertising was that?

Mr. EDMONDS. He is running a daily and weekly newspaper, I believe, at Wausau.

The CHAIRMAN. Who made that contract?

Mr. EDMONDS. I believe I sent him the money.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a bill and receipt for it?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any acknowledgment of it?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What advertising was that for?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know why the word "advertising" is in there, except that that is Mr. Sacket's method of designating certain of these matters to keep them in a certain account.

The CHAIRMAN. But you know about the payment of the money?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I paid the money.

The CHAIRMAN. You inquired what it was for when you authorized it, did you not?

Mr. EDMONDS. No. I had known Mr. Sturtevant for some little time, and, believing that he could be of assistance to us in Wausau—I knew that he was a friend of Senator STEPHENSON—I sent him a hundred dollars to use as he saw fit in promoting the interests of the Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. That was what might be termed a general contribution to the newspaper, was it; for its friendship?

Mr. EDMONDS. Perhaps it might be called that.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no specific advertisement—no space charged for—was there?

Mr. EDMONDS. In this particular instance, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. No bill was rendered for specific services as "advertising"?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not recall, in this instance. I sent him the money, asking him to use it in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. You sent him the money for the purpose of retaining a friendly attitude toward Senator STEPHENSON, did you not?

Mr. EDMONDS. I did not need to do that, because he was very friendly; his paper was for him and had been all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it was a gratuity. You already had the services, and in acknowledgment of friendship you sent him a hundred dollars; does that express it?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; I hardly think that expresses it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what was the hundred dollars for?

Mr. EDMONDS. I thought that with the hundred dollars he would be more active in his support of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it was for additional friendship to that already existing, was it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Perhaps that statement would be true.

The CHAIRMAN. It was to cement the existing friendship?

Mr. EDMONDS. Most assuredly; it was to help Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it in order that he might not probably be influenced to change his attitude of friendship?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; that was not at all necessary with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. You sent just that class of contributions to a number of papers, I suppose, did you not?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think there were a number of instances; yes, sir.

WISE MANAGERS DID NOT KNOW, AND DID NOT ATTEMPT TO FIND OUT, WHETHER THIS MONEY WAS SPENT HONESTLY OR NOT.

The CHAIRMAN. And that you have made no effort to ascertain whether or not the expenditures of this money were wrongful?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In any case?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have not.

THE EXTENT AND MANNER OF DISTRIBUTION.

The CHAIRMAN. You had 70 men, I understand, in your organization industriously engaged in distributing money among the common people throughout the campaign?

Mr. EDMONDS. I should say there were probably that many.

MANAGER SACKET'S DESCRIPTION OF "ORGANIZATION METHODS" (P. 175).

The CHAIRMAN. I notice that all of these items for organizing—and the greater part of them are for organizing—are after the time when you had filed the petitions with the signatures on them.

Mr. SACKET. My idea of organizing, as I used it in this statement, might include circulating of petitions, or any other work to perfect that organization which we hoped to use for the election of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it include the distribution and payment of money to men who were to work at the polls?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it include the payment of money to men who were to induce other men to vote for Senator STEPHENSON, without any limitation being placed upon the manner of inducement?

Mr. SACKET. It would include money expended that way; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It might include money expended in purchasing votes, might it?

Mr. SACKET. It might.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it?

Mr. SACKET. Not to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you say it did not?

Mr. SACKET. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

METHOD BY WHICH SACKET SPENT MONEY.

(167) Mr. SACKET. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. What services did he perform?

Mr. SACKET. I do not know.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Was he one of the men you made an arrangement with?

Mr. SACKET. He was not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay that on the order of Mr. Edmonds?

Mr. SACKET. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay money on the order of any person other than Mr. Edmonds?

Mr. SACKET. Not to my recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. When Mr. Edmonds gave you an order, such as is indicated by that payment, did he give it to you in writing?

Mr. SACKET. Not necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. How did he give it to you?

Mr. SACKET. He told me that he wanted a check for $300 for Mr. R. E. Orton.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a verbal communication?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would get the check?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And would you make a memorandum?

Mr. SACKET. I would.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you inquire of Edmonds what the money was to be used for?

Mr. SACKET. Not in all cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you in this case?

Mr. SACKET. I do not remember.
 The CHAIRMAN. You have no recollection about it?
 Mr. SACKET. No, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You do not know whether it was to be used for purchasing votes or for what purposes?
 Mr. SACKET. I had no knowledge of my own whatever.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did you not feel it incumbent upon you to know for what the money that you paid out was to be used?
 Mr. SACKET. The money that I paid out on Mr. Edmonds's order; no.
 The CHAIRMAN. You think you would be relieved of responsibility if the money was to be paid out for an unlawful purpose merely because Mr. Edmonds told you to pay it?
 Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You think you would be relieved?
 Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You would not undertake to assert that if an associate were to ask you to violate the law you would be justified in doing it?
 Mr. SACKET. No, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. Then how do you account for your answer that if you believed if Mr. Edmonds told you to pay this money out for an unlawful purpose that Mr. Edmonds and not you would be responsible?
 Mr. SACKET. I felt that when Mr. Edmonds asked for money I was under obligations to give it to him. I was Mr. STEPHENSON's manager.

DESTRUCTION OF MEMORANDA.

Manager Sacket, in testifying as to the payment of an item of $400, stated that he was unable to remember anything about it. He then testified as follows (p. 164):
 The CHAIRMAN. That emphasizes the misfortune of the destruction of your memoranda, does it not? Now, you say, in the absence of that memorandum, you can not remember anything about the $400. It may have been used to purchase votes in violation of law, may it not?
 Mr. SACKET. I have no knowledge one way or the other.
 The CHAIRMAN. So that a payment of this money passing through your hands as the representative of the candidate may have been used, so far as you can state, for an illegal purpose?
 Mr. SACKET. I do not know.

PERRIN'S EXPENDITURES.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is C. R. Fridley?
 Mr. PERRIN. He is an attorney at Superior.
 The CHAIRMAN. Is he an old resident?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. Is he an old man or a young man?
 Mr. PERRIN. He is a man of 42 or 43 years of age.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did he support Senator STEPHENSON for nomination at the primaries and before the primaries?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. Was he in public life in any capacity?
 Mr. PERRIN. No.
 The CHAIRMAN. He was what you call a political worker, was he?
 Mr. PERRIN. No. He was a practicing lawyer.
 The CHAIRMAN. He was actively engaged in the practice of law?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You never asked him for any accounting as to the expense he had incurred.
 Mr. PERRIN. I did not.
 The CHAIRMAN. What is Mr. Fridley's business, you say?
 Mr. PERRIN. He is an attorney.
 The CHAIRMAN. The next item is $10 to H. L. Dresser. Who is H. L. Dresser?
 Mr. PERRIN. Mr. Dresser had nothing to do with the campaign, and does not live in the State. I was in Duluth and somebody made application to me for money, and I had to go to him and borrow it, and gave him my check to reimburse him. It was money expended in the campaign.
 The CHAIRMAN. He lived in Duluth?
 Mr. PERRIN. He lived in Duluth when this application was made to me.
 The CHAIRMAN. You drew this money for your own expenditure, or to be paid out by you?
 Mr. PERRIN. I drew that money to be paid to some one in the STEPHENSON campaign.
 The CHAIRMAN. Can you say to whom you paid it?
 Mr. PERRIN. I can not.
 The CHAIRMAN. We go to the next item of $50 cash. Can you account for any part of it?
 Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection of it.
 The CHAIRMAN. The last item I inquired about, of $10 to Dresser, was on the 18th of August.
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. And another item the same day, the 18th, is $50 cash. You say you can not account for that?
 Mr. PERRIN. No.
 The CHAIRMAN. At that time you had received the $3,000. You received it on the 15th. So you had all of this $5,000 then available?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. And on the 19th you drew a check to W. W. Savage for $25, and he indorsed it. What was that for?
 Mr. PERRIN. I am not sure about that. I sent him out two or three times, I do not remember when, to get information to enable us to carry on this work.
 The CHAIRMAN. He was your clerk?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. On the 21st you paid out $200 cash. Can you account for any part of that?
 Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection of it.
 The CHAIRMAN. On the same day you paid out $100 cash. Can you account for any part of that?
 Mr. PERRIN. I have no distinct recollection.
 The CHAIRMAN. Again on the same day, $40 cash. Can you account for that or any part of it?
 Mr. PERRIN. I do not recollect that.
 The CHAIRMAN. Was it money expended in the city of Superior?
 Mr. PERRIN. This money was expended in four counties—Douglas, Bayfield, Sawyer, and Washburn.
 The CHAIRMAN. Are they the northern counties in the State?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. The most northern?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. Tell us the conversation—what he said to you and what you said to him that resulted in the handing over of that check.
 Mr. PERRIN. I can not remember the details.

The CHAIRMAN. Give use the substance.
 Mr. PERRIN. The substance of it was that I went to him and asked him if he would put in some time in the Stephenson campaign. He said he would do what he could. I asked him how much money he thought he would need at that time, and he said that he ought to have $250.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell him that you were disbursing Stephenson money at that time? You told him you had received this thousand dollars, did you?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. And he told you he could be of some use to Senator STEPHENSON, did he?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. How did he tell you he could be of use to Senator STEPHENSON?
 Mr. PERRIN. I guess I knew as much about that as he did. I do not know that he expressed himself in specific terms as to what he could do or would do.
 The CHAIRMAN. What did he do for Senator STEPHENSON's campaign?
 Mr. PERRIN. I do not know.
 The CHAIRMAN. You say you knew what he could do?
 Mr. PERRIN. I knew what he could do; certainly.
 The CHAIRMAN. Was that to be taken as a criterion of what he did do?
 Mr. PERRIN. It was by me.
 The CHAIRMAN. What did he do?
 Mr. PERRIN. Taking that as a criterion, he could, and I believe he did, get men interested for Senator STEPHENSON that neither Senator STEPHENSON, Mr. Edmonds, nor I could otherwise get.
 The CHAIRMAN. Get men that you could not get?
 Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 The CHAIRMAN. How would he get them interested? What would he do?
 Mr. PERRIN. I think he would mostly talk.
 The CHAIRMAN. What would he say to them?
 Mr. PERRIN. I am sure I do not know.
 The CHAIRMAN. What would be the nature of the conversation?
 Mr. PERRIN. I would not undertake to say.
 The CHAIRMAN. How do you know it is not just exactly the conversation you or Mr. Edmonds would have had with these people?
 Mr. PERRIN. Because I know that I could not talk to some of those people the way Mr. Shields could.
 The CHAIRMAN. If you do not know what he said to them, how do you know that?
 Mr. PERRIN. There are things, you know, that we know without being able to explain or express after long years of acquaintance with a man that no man living can sit on the witness stand and detail.
 The CHAIRMAN. Do you think you are worth the $3,000 that Mr. STEPHENSON gave you?
 Mr. PERRIN. Oh, I know I am worth that.
 The CHAIRMAN. It takes a pretty good political talker to get that amount of money.
 Mr. PERRIN. I did not have to talk any to get it.
 The CHAIRMAN. How much of this money indicated by the cash items or the checks remained in your hands?
 Mr. PERRIN. Not a cent.
 The CHAIRMAN. And yet you can not account for a cent of it that you paid out?
 Mr. PERRIN. I can not in detail; no, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. Not a single item?
 Mr. PERRIN. Not one.
 The CHAIRMAN. That was rather a spectacular campaign in some respects, was it not, with money flowing out freely in those amounts?
 Mr. PERRIN. To speak in the vernacular, I guess we got them "going some."
 Senator SUTHERLAND. In handing over sums of money to people that you employed in Senator STEPHENSON's interest, did you give any of them any instructions whatever as to what they should do?
 Mr. PERRIN. If I thought it was necessary when I gave the man money to tell him what to do, I have no doubt I did.
 Senator SUTHERLAND. Did you?
 Mr. PERRIN. I do not remember.
 Senator SUTHERLAND. You do not recall having given anybody any instructions?
 Mr. PERRIN. No; I do not recall it. I know there were some instances where I said to some man, or some men, that we would look to him or them to provide workers at the polls, for instance, or teams to get voters out. But that was all in the most general way.
 Senator SUTHERLAND. You gave them no specific instructions that you recall as to what they should do?
 Mr. PERRIN. I do not recall now; no. I do not recall now that I did.
 The CHAIRMAN. On August 5, $200 cash. For what was that cash expended, and by whom?
 Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.
 The CHAIRMAN. August 6, $25 cash. What do you say as to that?
 Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.
 The CHAIRMAN. August 6, $200. What have you to say as to that item?
 Mr. PERRIN. I do not remember it.
 The CHAIRMAN. When you say you do not remember, you mean—
 Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.
 The CHAIRMAN. That you have no information to give in regard to it, based upon your recollection?
 Mr. PERRIN. None whatever.
 The CHAIRMAN. On August 7, $100 cash. Have you any recollection as to the purpose for which that was expended?
 Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. And on August 7, again, $75; and on August 7, again, $50; that is $225 on August 7. Have you any knowledge as to what that was used for?
 Mr. PERRIN. Those items are all "cash"?
 The CHAIRMAN. Yes; they are all cash.
 Mr. PERRIN. No; I have no recollection.
 The CHAIRMAN. On the 8th we have cash items of $50, $50, $50, $50, and $50—$250; do you know the purpose for which that money, or any part of it, was expended?
 Mr. PERRIN. Those are cash?
 The CHAIRMAN. Yes; cash items.
 Mr. PERRIN. No; I have no recollection.
 Senator POMERENE. You have said in answer to Senator SUTHERLAND—I want to quote you correctly, and if I do not you will correct me—that you probably paid money to 100 different persons, though you were not definite as to your statement.

Mr. PERRIN. No; I can not be.
 Senator POMERENE. I understand that. You also said to him again in your examination that you knew personally very many of the men that you employed.

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.
 Senator POMERENE. Do you mean to tell the committee that you do not now remember any of the men to whom you paid this money, outside of the few names that you gave to Senator HEYBURN?

Mr. PERRIN. That is just exactly what I mean to say.
 Senator POMERENE. Not one of them?
 Mr. PERRIN. Not one of them.

MR. PERRIN'S METHODS OF DISTRIBUTING $5,000.

(689) Mr. PERRIN. I planned that we would take the first $1,000 and get hold of as many of the men who were accustomed to doing political work in that territory as we could get hold of with that money, laying the foundation for further and more extensive electioneering if the money was forthcoming. * * * At that time, I think, I knew I would get another $1,000.

"The CHAIRMAN. With this class of expenditure the motive does cut some figure. You were representing a candidate for office, under the laws of a State, and you were not spending your money, but his. Did it not occur to you that he would be responsible for the manner of your expenditure, and that incidentally to that you would have some responsibility?"

Mr. PERRIN. No.
 The CHAIRMAN. It did not?

Mr. PERRIN. No.
 The CHAIRMAN. You did not feel that you were under any responsibility to any person or any law for the manner of the expenditure of this money?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not think I said that.
 The CHAIRMAN. I asked you. It is a question I am asking you.
 Mr. PERRIN. Just read the question, please.
 The reporter read as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. You did not feel that you were under any responsibility to any person or any law for the manner of the expenditure of this money?"

Mr. PERRIN. I felt that I was responsible to Senator STEPHENSON for the expenditure of the money that he put in my hands.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean the manner of the expenditure?
 Mr. PERRIN. No; I do not think so, entirely. I think I was selected to exercise an independent judgment upon the manner in which his candidacy should be furthered in that particular.

The CHAIRMAN. And leave the responsibility upon Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. PERRIN. May I inquire—responsibility for what?
 The CHAIRMAN. The manner in which you expended it; were you going to let him take chances on that?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not think the Senator was taking any chances on that.

The CHAIRMAN. To return to Mr. Shields: You have not been able to account for any item of expenditure by Mr. Shields; so that we shall have to rely upon Mr. Shields, shall we, for that information?

Mr. PERRIN. I presume he can give you some idea as to what he did with that money. I should like to say, if I may, that of these cash items I think Mr. Fridley had more than appears to have been given him upon checks drawn to his order.

Mr. PERRIN. This statute has never received in practical operation, by anybody that I know of in the State of Wisconsin, the construction which has been suggested here. It is the common, ordinary thing throughout northern Wisconsin to take a man to the theater or take him to lunch, not necessarily to corrupt his mind, but to enlighten him. You do these things to get a man's mind in a receptive mood. You can not go after him, Senator, you know, with an ax and beat an idea into him. It has got to be worked out along practical lines. It seems foolish for me to sit here and talk to you gentlemen about this thing, because you know so much more about it than I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Our examination here is not so much for our entertainment as to make a record.

Mr. PERRIN. I beg your pardon. I apologize.
 The CHAIRMAN. You need make no apology. This is to be taken as a test of your meaning of "electioneering" then, is it?

Mr. PERRIN. I think that is a fair test of the meaning of ninety-nine men out of a hundred who conduct politics.

The CHAIRMAN. Of "electioneering"?

Mr. PERRIN. "Electioneering."

The CHAIRMAN. You think that comes within the definition of "electioneering"?

Mr. PERRIN. I certainly do.

The CHAIRMAN. And when you speak of having expended money in electioneering, either by you or by those whom you employed, you include that kind of proceeding under the head "electioneering"?

Mr. PERRIN. It may be included.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You think it is as legitimate to reach a man through his appetite as it is through his intellect?

KNOWINGLY PAID MONEY TO SHAUERS.

The CHAIRMAN. You said, or I understood you to say, that there was only one case in which you knowingly paid money to a man who was a candidate for the legislature; what case was that?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Shauers, of Oconto County.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Was he elected?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What was his name?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Shauers.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you pay him money?

Mr. EDMONDS. He was a railroad man, and for the purpose of organizing he went in different parts of the State to see railroad men.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he in employment then or out of employment?

Mr. EDMONDS. Out of employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he went from his home to different parts of the State, outside of the legislative district where he was a candidate?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. It was distinctly understood that he was to spend no time, no money, in that district.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, but did he?

Mr. EDMONDS. He did not, to my knowledge.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, in his own district?

Mr. EDMONDS. In his own district.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So that nothing that was expended by him had any relation to the campaign pending in his district?

Mr. EDMONDS. Absolutely not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Either directly or indirectly?

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay Shauers?

Mr. EDMONDS. I don't recall. I should think it might range from $50 to $100 or $125. I don't think more than that. I paid him, I think, two or three different times $25.

THOMAS REYNOLDS.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive any more than $180 from Senator STEPHENSON, or from anyone in his behalf?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I received $100 from Senator STEPHENSON's manager. The CHAIRMAN. Is that the $100 that you have referred to? Did you receive $280 altogether from Senator STEPHENSON or his manager?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I did not consider it from Senator STEPHENSON, although Senator STEPHENSON told me afterwards that he told them to send it to me—I supposed for my services; I do not know for what.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive $280 altogether from Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You received $80 from Senator STEPHENSON personally, did you not?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you received $100 from Senator STEPHENSON personally?

Mr. REYNOLDS. No, sir; not personally.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom did you receive it?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I received it through the mail.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive the second $100 through the mail?

Mr. REYNOLDS. The second $100; yes, sir; that is the only $100 I received through the mail, the second $100—no; the first $100. The first $100.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive another $100 after that?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I received $100 by check from his manager.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive $100 by check from Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. REYNOLDS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive more than one sum of $100 from the manager?

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is all I received from the manager—$100; a $100 check.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us how you received the $280.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I received $80 from Senator STEPHENSON and $100 afterwards from him.

The CHAIRMAN. From Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Personally?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Not personally; no.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you receive it?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Through the mail.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you pay the largest sum of money?

Mr. RIORDAN. In all?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RIORDAN. During the campaign?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; out of this fund.

Mr. RIORDAN. For any purpose?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RIORDAN. $250 to E. A. Everett, of Eagle River.

The CHAIRMAN. For what did you pay him that sum?

Mr. RIORDAN. For traveling through the counties of Vilas, Iron, and Oneida and ascertaining, as far as he was able, the sentiment of the people as he went along; that is, those who were for and against each of the several candidates.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he report to you a memorandum of people, showing the result of that work?

Mr. RIORDAN. He made two such trips through the county. After the first one he came back and made a report to me, and the second time he came back and made a similar report.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us who he was.

Mr. RIORDAN. E. A. Everett is the proprietor of the Everett resort.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?

Mr. RIORDAN. That consists of a large hotel dining room and about 40 cottages on the Eagle chain of lakes, at Eagle River.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a summer resort?

Mr. RIORDAN. It is a summer resort. Prior to that time he was a member of the Wisconsin Assembly.

The CHAIRMAN. But at the time you made this arrangement with him he was not a public officer?

Mr. RIORDAN. He was a candidate for public office.

The CHAIRMAN. What office?

Mr. RIORDAN. The office of member of the assembly.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time you paid him this money?

Mr. RIORDAN. I did not pay him the money, I see by my testimony, until the 31st of August.

Senator POMERENE. Is that George E. Everett?

Mr. RIORDAN. E. A. Everett.

The CHAIRMAN. The testimony would indicate that you paid it to him before the primary election.

Mr. RIORDAN. I think a day or two before the primary election.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He was a candidate for the assembly?

Mr. RIORDAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he elected?

Mr. RIORDAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When you paid it to him, did you know that he was a candidate for the assembly?

Mr. RIORDAN. I think I did, certainly. I surely talked with him about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he announcing for whom he would vote in the legislature if he were elected?

Mr. RIORDAN. Yes; he was to vote for the candidate who received the primary nomination.

The CHAIRMAN. Without regard to who it was?

Mr. RIORDAN. Yes; and I would like to add there that the man who was running against him made the same promise.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What was his name?

Mr. RIORDAN. D. B. Stevens.

The CHAIRMAN. They promised to abide the result of the primary?

Mr. RIORDAN. Yes. The campaign was made with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. For whom did they assert their influence during the primary, the time preceding the election?

Mr. RIORDAN. I think for themselves, individually.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they announcing their support of any particular candidate, or doing anything in the interest of any particular candidate?

Mr. RIORDAN. No; I do not think they were.

BANCROFT'S METHODS.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):
 "The result of our conference was that I, being pretty well acquainted with the county, and knowing who the political workers were in the county, consented to disburse this amount of money for Mr. STEPHENSON."
 Is that correct?
 Mr. BANCROFT. That is correct.
 The CHAIRMAN. Give us the names of the people and the amounts you gave them.
 Mr. BANCROFT. George Mehaffy I paid $100.
 The CHAIRMAN. What was he to do for that $100?
 Mr. BANCROFT. I gave him no instructions whatever.
 Senator POMERENE. What is his address?
 Mr. BANCROFT. Richland Center.
 The CHAIRMAN. What did he do with the money?
 Mr. BANCROFT. I could not tell you.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask him to render you an account of the manner of its expenditure?
 Mr. BANCROFT. I did not.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did he ever tell you how he expended the money?
 Mr. BANCROFT. He did not.
 The CHAIRMAN. Then you never knew?
 Mr. BANCROFT. I do not know.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever know?
 Mr. BANCROFT. I never knew.

MONEY PAID TO MULDER, CANDIDATE FOR THE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then you said, "and he got some of this money"; so I got the impression that you referred to McConnell.
 Senator POMERENE. You understood that I was referring to Mulder?
 Mr. GORDON. Yes.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is all right, then.
 Senator POMERENE. Yes; that is all right, so there will be no misunderstanding. Was it as much as $50?
 Mr. GORDON. I can not tell you how much it was.
 Senator POMERENE. You can certainly give us some idea as to whether it was a matter of $5 or $10 or $50 or $100.
 Mr. GORDON. I can not tell you definitely how much it was.
 Senator POMERENE. I know; but I am not asking you for that. I am asking you for your best judgment about it.
 Mr. GORDON. It was probably, I should guess, from $25 to $50.
 Senator POMERENE. What did you say to him with reference to his campaign and what use was to be made of this money?
 Mr. GORDON. He was one of the original STEPHENSON men in the county, and I asked him to do what he could in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON.
 Senator POMERENE. What else was said?
 Mr. GORDON. That is all I can recollect. I do not recollect all that was said. That is what I naturally would say.
 Senator POMERENE. Since your attention has been directed to this matter, do you not recall that Mulder was a candidate for the general assembly?
 Mr. GORDON. I say he was a candidate, but I can not recollect whether he was when I gave him the money or whether he subsequently became a candidate.
 Senator POMERENE. I misunderstood you, then.
 Mr. GORDON. He was a candidate; yes.
 Senator POMERENE. We understand each other now—that he was in fact a candidate?
 Mr. GORDON. He was a candidate; yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. But you meant to say that you do not remember whether at the time you gave him the money he was then an announced candidate or not?
 Mr. GORDON. That is the idea.

WHEELER'S METHODS OF DISTRIBUTION.

William G. Wheeler distributed $600 and aided in the "organization." Mr. C. B. Salmon was one of his lieutenants. Mr. Salmon reported the success of his operations in the following letter to his chief (p. 897):

BELOIT, WIS., September 1.

* MY DEAR WHEELER: I inclose bills in blank which are correct. All the men and rigs were in the exclusive use of Stephenson. We did not mix any other candidates. We also had about as many more that were STEPHENSON and one or two other candidates. At this writing, 4 p. m., I predict 1,700 to 1,800 votes, and that STEPHENSON will get 65 per cent.

Very truly,
 We should pay these men in the morning.
 (Our italics.)

C. B. SALMON.

MR. DART'S METHODS IN DISTRIBUTING MONEY.

Dart was one of the deputy game wardens, and received $400 for "organization purposes."
 The chairman read to the witness an extract from his testimony given before the legislative committee as follows:
 "Q. What did you do with it?—A. Spent it.
 "Q. How?—A. Every old way.
 "Q. What is that?—A. Every way.
 "Q. Tell us some way that you spent it.—A. Oh, I spent quite a lot of it in saloons."
 The CHAIRMAN. Is that true?
 Mr. DART. Well, I should not go past any of them if there was anybody there I wanted to see.

The CHAIRMAN (reading from previous testimony):
 "Q. Did you make any payments to individuals?—A. Oh, yes; I gave them quite a little bunch of money.
 "Q. Who were the persons to whom you gave 'quite a little bunch of money'?—A. Oh, I don't know; I could not mention half or a quarter of them."

He, however, on pages 977 to 982, gives an interesting account of the expenditures that he remembers.

The testimony of Mr. Wellensgard, on pages 852, 855, and 856; that of Mr. French, at page 876; and that of George Beyer, at page 881, furnish fair illustrations of the methods employed by local workers.

LIQUOR EXPENDITURES.

Senator POMERENE. Or, if he got a drink of whisky at the bar and drank it there, that would not be prohibited; but if he got a half pint and put it in his pocket and took it away for a swig after a while, that would be illegal?
 Mr. SACKET. I think I should have to revert to the custom again and say that the half pint was lawful.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Is it the custom in Wisconsin to buy the voters bottles of whisky and give to them?

Mr. SACKET. And kegs of beer; yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And kegs of beer?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me get that question.

Senator POMERENE. Being from Maine, you do not know anything about that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is why I was quite anxious to get the actual practical situation. I trust we are adding to the sum of human knowledge and at the same time increasing my own information. Of course, I fully realize my infirmity.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Now, Mr. Sacket, do you seriously mean that that is the custom in Wisconsin—

Mr. SACKET. The custom, as I understand it; yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. To purchase bottles of whisky and kegs of beer for voters?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

"Q. You kept no track of it. How could you present a bill to Mr. Wayland? Was that just an estimate of what you spent?—A. No. I think there was $135 cash I had in my pocket, without the automobile, which was $15. I think it was $150 I had that day when I left the office."

Is that correct?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

"Q. And you spent all that in one day?—A. Yes, sir."

(827) Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; it was a supper, I guess, that cost about $1.60 for the two of us.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You spent $1.60 for food, as I understand you?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. That would leave $305.40 for whisky and cigars and automobiles?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Do you think you spent a little too much for food?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; I did not think anything about it.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You do not recall spending any of the money for anything else?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is all it was spent for.

Senator SUTHERLAND. That is, you spent $305.40 for an automobile and for whisky and cigars?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And that was your notion of furthering the interests of Senator STEPHENSON in this campaign, was it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is the way they make a campaign up in that territory.

Senator SUTHERLAND. That is the way you made it, at all events?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is customary up there.

MONEY PAID TO "ENTHUSE" VOTERS.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Edmonds, did you pay the $50 to Mr. Dettman on August 8?

Mr. EDMONDS. My recollection is not clear on that, but I think I sent it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. You think you sent it to him; for what purpose?

Mr. EDMONDS. For assistance among the German Lutherans in his locality.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of assistance?

Mr. EDMONDS. So that he would get out and help to get out the vote—interest his friends—for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no vote to be gotten out on August 8 for any purpose—nearly a month before the election.

Mr. EDMONDS. When I say getting out the vote, I do not refer to the actual carrying or taking of the persons to the polls, but to interest them so that they would get out.

The CHAIRMAN. Enthuse them?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is the idea—enthuse them. Thank you for the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. "O. L. Gust, $300, August 8." Did you pay that money?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not recall that payment at all.

* * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by lining them up for Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. EDMONDS. Getting them interested in his election.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussing his election with them.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Paying any money to them for any purpose?

Mr. EDMONDS. That was up to the man's judgment as to whether that was necessary or advisable in the conduct of the campaign for Senator STEPHENSON's election.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that money given to him to expend among the railroad men for cigars or treats of any kind if he saw fit to so expend it?

Mr. EDMONDS. So far as I know he might have expended it in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no restriction placed upon it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think not; not in that manner.

We regret that we can not feel warranted in finding for the sitting Member, but we believe the methods employed at the primary were corrupt; that they were against public policy; that they were demoralizing in character; that they directly contributed to destroy the purity and freedom of the election; that they violated the fundamental principles at the basis of our system of government; and that they are not to be tolerated by the Senate of the United States as a means of procuring a seat in that body.

We desire to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That ISAAC STEPHENSON was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin.

PROPOSED PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. BRYAN. I present my individual views from the Committee on Pensions on the bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico (S. Rept. 355, pt. 3).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida presents the views of himself, as a part of the minority of the Committee on Pensions, on House bill No. 1. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that it be printed along with the majority and other minority reports from the same committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed as part 2 of the report.

Mr. BRYAN. The report has not yet been printed, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go in as part 2 of the printed report.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ascertain what was done with the minority report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been received and ordered printed as part 2 in connection with the majority report.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state that the majority report, together with the first minority report, has already been printed, and 15,000 extra copies have been ordered printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This would then properly be printed as part 3 of that report.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right; I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be the order, without objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of views. I inquire whether or not a minority report is any part of the report of a committee. We are falling into a habit of treating it as though it were a part of the report of a committee. I understand that it is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Really it is not a report at all; it is the views of certain minority members of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it should not be given a number that would indicate that it was a part of the report. There is but one report, and that should be the only report. The other might be denominated views of certain members, naming them; but I think we fall into an error by treating it as a part of the report and giving it a number.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the custom has been to print such matters as are now presented as parts 1, 2, and 3, whatever the case may be, of the report.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I know we have fallen into a bad way. It is the same class of error that has grown up in the printing of the decisions of the courts. No more annoying and useless proceeding was ever indulged in than the printing of the dissenting opinion of the judge of a court. It merely affords quibbling grounds for quibbling lawyers, and it is not authority for any purpose. I think the same rule would apply here. Of course, a judge may publish his dissenting views in a magazine or a newspaper, but they ought not to be published in the official volumes of the Supreme Court Reports. Neither ought the minority reports of a committee of this body to be considered as of the status of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho makes no motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. I made no motion. I rose to express views.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Precisely. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills is the next order.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $22,000 for grading and improving Sixteenth Street NW., from Montague Street to the Military Road, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama submitted an amendment relative to the status of the police court judges of the District of Columbia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the acquirement of lands at Cape Henry, Va., as contemplated by the project of the War Department, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the fortifications appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE. On December 19, 1911, I submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,956 for the pro rata share of the United States in the administrative expenses of the permanent International Council for the Exploration of the Sea in the interests of the commercial fisheries, intended to be proposed to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, which I intended to have referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I find either through my error or some accident that the amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations direct. I reintroduce the amendment and ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15), which was read and referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas it has been claimed and widely circulated on the platform and through the press of the country, that import duties on wool and woolen goods, as established by the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act of 1909, are in many instances excessive; and

Whereas a nonpartisan Tariff Board, under provisions of law, have carefully investigated and, on the 21st day of December, 1911, fully reported their findings and conclusions in relation to the relative costs of production of such articles at home and abroad, and other matters pertaining to the production of and trade in such articles of commerce; and

Whereas the Congress is now prepared to revise said wool schedule to conform to such findings and conclusions: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of this Congress that Congress should immediately proceed to the consideration of a bill to effect a revision of said wool schedule to the end that if any inequality or injustice may be found therein it may be corrected.

CLASSIFICATION OF SENATORS (S. DOC. NO. 334).

Mr. LODGE. I present a pamphlet on the proceedings in the United States Senate relating to the classification of Senators. This pamphlet was published in 1907, and the copies are now exhausted. It has been brought up to date by the Chief Clerk of the Senate. I move that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 19115. An act making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims reported under the provisions of acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to call up for consideration at this time a question of the highest privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call up Senate resolution No. 136. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. HEYBURN from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, and to report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices; that said committee or subcommittee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, to hold its session at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee or chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the reading of the report, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report. The Secretary read the following report (S. Rept. 349), submitted by Mr. HEYBURN on the 12th instant:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred certain charges preferred by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, with instructions to report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

On August 15, 1911, the Senate adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections or any subcommittee thereof be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, and report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices; that said committee or subcommittee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, to hold its session at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee or chairman of the subcommittee."

Pursuant to the authority given by said resolution the Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed a subcommittee, consisting of Mr. HEYBURN (chairman), Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. PAYNTER, and Mr. POMERENE, with full powers to investigate said charges.

On January 20, 1912, the subcommittee reported to the full committee as follows:

IN THE MATTER OF THE INVESTIGATION OF THE CHARGES AGAINST ISAAC STEPHENSON, A SENATOR OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE STATE OF WISCONSIN.

To the honorable the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate:

Your subcommittee proceeded pursuant to the terms of its appointment to investigate the above-mentioned charges, and in pursuance of said duty met in the city of Washington and, having organized, proceeded to adopt a plan for holding such investigation.

It was agreed by your subcommittee that the investigation should commence on October 2, 1911, at the city of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin.

Accordingly your subcommittee met at the city of Milwaukee on the above-mentioned date, all parties in interest being present. Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, W. E. Black, and H. A. J. Upham, Esqs., appeared as counsel for Senator STEPHENSON.

The governor and the attorney general of the State of Wisconsin were notified by the chairman of your subcommittee of the time and place of the hearing and were invited to indicate to the committee whether or not they desired to be present and participate in any manner in such investigation. The governor of Wisconsin, speaking for the State, informed your subcommittee that no one on behalf of the State would appear at such investigation.

Your subcommittee then proceeded to the examination of witnesses and documents, which examination occupied 25 days, during which time 124 witnesses were sworn, 35 affidavits received, and 2,100 pages of printed testimony taken, which testimony, affidavits, and exhibits are herewith submitted as a part of the report of your subcommittee.

Your subcommittee has given the fullest consideration to all the testimony introduced and has considered its weight and effect under the rules pertaining to the investigation and is of the opinion that the charges preferred against Senator ISAAC STEPHENSON have not been sustained, and your subcommittee finds that the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin was not procured by corrupt methods or practices in said election of ISAAC STEPHENSON.

ATLEE POMERENE.

Mr. HEYBURN, chairman of the subcommittee, submitted a statement of his views in support of the conclusions reached, and on the request of members of the committee further consideration of the matter was postponed to February 3, 1912, on which date a further postponement was had to February 10, 1912, with the understanding that any member of the committee might file a statement of his views to accompany the final report of the committee, and that a vote might be taken on that date.

On February 10, 1912, the Committee on Privileges and Elections met in regular session and received a statement of the views of Mr. POMERENE and Mr. SUTHERLAND in support of the report of the subcommittee, and proceeded to the consideration of the report of the subcommittee, together with the views expressed by the members thereof upon a full record of the testimony and proceedings in the case.

On motion it was ordered that the report of the subcommittee be adopted and that said subcommittee be discharged.

Whereupon it was ordered that Mr. HEYBURN be instructed to report the action of the committee to the Senate, together with a transcript of testimony and of all the proceedings of the subcommittee, including the address of Hon. Charles E. Littlefield before the whole committee, and also the individual views presented by members of the committee. Leave was given to file a minority report by those dissenting from the conclusions reached.

Wherefore your committee, having given full consideration to the law and to the testimony and to all of the facts and circumstances brought to its notice, does find that the charges preferred against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, are not sustained, and your committee further finds that the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States was not procured by corrupt methods or practices.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I move that the report of the committee be adopted, and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as a Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). The Senator from Idaho moves that the report just read be adopted, and that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] be declared entitled to his seat.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am going to speak on the motion. I am holding the floor for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES. I thought the Senator from Idaho was yielding for a vote to be taken, and I did not desire a vote to be taken at the present time. I wanted to ask that the views of the minority be read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have given notice that this question will be open until next Wednesday, and I am going to speak on the resolution which I have presented.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to require the printing clerk to bring into the Senate volume 1 of the testimony in this case as ordered to be printed. I want that done right away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator requests that volume 1 of the testimony be brought in.

Mr. HEYBURN. I request that the executive officer of the Senate instruct the printing clerk to produce at the bar of the Senate volume 1 of the testimony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks that the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to direct the printing clerk to produce volume 1 of the hearings.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are attempting to be somewhat obdurate, and the printing clerk seems to think that he has more power than the Senate of the United States. I want to find out whether he has or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be entered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I gave notice some days ago that on February 21, after the routine morning business, I would ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this matter. In the meantime I think it is to the best advantage of the business of the Senate that some consideration should be given to the resolution. The Secretary has read the report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and of that committee to the Senate. I desire first to present the views that actuated me, as chairman of the subcommittee and then as a member of the whole Committee on Privileges and Elections, in arriving at the conclusion expressed in this report. I think it only fair to those who are going to address the Senate upon this matter that they should be fully advised as to the reasons moving the majority of the committee to their conclusion.

It involves a question of the highest parliamentary privilege; it involves the right of a sitting Member of this body to retain his seat herein under an election by the legislature of his State. It must be borne in mind that at the time the proceeding attacked was had Mr. STEPHENSON was a Senator of the United States. It would be burdensome upon the Senate for me to recount the details leading up to this great controversy existing in the State of Wisconsin, and I shall endeavor not to be tedious or to go into unnecessary detail; but it is the first time in the history of the United States that the question of the effect and validity of a direct primary election law has been called for consideration by Congress. It is the first contest over the election of a Member of either House of Congress that depends in any way upon the direct primary, and it is important that Congress should give consideration to it as a new principle of government sought to be foisted upon the people. We must give consideration to the effect of a law that never was enacted.

Mr. CULLOM. Then it is not a law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I am going to qualify that. That sounds like a bull, but I refer to that class of law which some people think ought to be enacted who do not know the difference between a law that is enacted and one which they think should be. We have, so to speak, two classes of law in this country—that which is enacted under the power of the Constitution of the United States, and that which is only the wish of some one which they think should be enacted into law—and we are getting so confused that there are a number of persons who do not know the difference.

My mind reverts to the time of the great labor troubles in the Coeur d'Alene country, when a very good fellow that I had taken some interest in and had been able to do something for loomed up as one of the prisoners to be examined as to his part in those riots. I said to him, "Why, Eugene, I am astonished to find you here; how did you ever become identified with these felons and murderers?"—they had been killing people and blowing up mills. He said, "I have a right to be here." I said, "Do you not know better than to go out and violate the law and kill people and destroy their property?" He replied, "I did not violate the law; I did it because it was the law that I should do it." I said, "Where do you find any such law as that?" "Why," he said, "it is the law of the miners' union." I said, "Do you not know any better than that? Do you think the law of the miners' union takes precedence as against the law of the land?" He answered, "Of course it does to those who belong to the union." Now, we are getting just that condition of affairs in the body of the citizenship of this country, and if we do not look out we will find ourselves in the position that that poor ignorant fellow was.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand, the Senator from Idaho is discussing this matter from the standpoint of the views set forth in his opinion, which is embodied in the report. In reading the report, the Secretary did not read the individual opinion of the Senator from Idaho. The other members of the subcommittee that joined in the report also offer their views. It seems to me we should have before us the views of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], as well as the views of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], so that we may understand that the Senator from Idaho is simply expressing his individual views on this subject, and not the views of the entire committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I called for the reading of the report it was my intention to have read the views of the subcommittee. The Secretary stopped just after reading the formal report, on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. If the Senator from Idaho desires to have those views read, the Secretary will read them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me straighten out this matter, if the Chair please. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has referred to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] as having joined in a separate report, as I understand. The Senator from Ohio joined in the report of the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] expresses certain views in the report, he and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] joining in the expression of those views. They differ upon the very question which the Senator from Idaho is now discussing. What I desired was that the views of the Senator from Idaho, as embodied in the report, be read to the Senate, and also the views of the other members of the committee who disagree with him upon some of the features of the report.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will be gratified in part at least. I was merely expressing a text as a foundation for the reading of the views to which he refers—that is, the views expressed by myself. I was premising it with these few pertinent remarks. It is my purpose now, as a part of my remarks, to proceed to the reading of the views which I expressed to the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to request that the minority report also be read after the Senator from Idaho—

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not the reading clerk. I say that with all deference to the Senator. I probably shall allow that duty to devolve at a later time upon some Senator who is in sympathy with what he calls the minority views.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say, if the Senator will yield, that I was not asking him to read it. I should very much prefer that the clerks at the desk read it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me a moment, I think on the reading of the report the Senate has a right to have the views read. I do not think it is a case where a Senator is obliged to read them himself. When I made the request I intended to have the contents of the report read, the whole of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read it now.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator prefers to read it himself, that is entirely satisfactory to me. Then I want to have read also the views of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the views of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in entire sympathy with that course; but I find it best to read the report I have written.

Mr. LODGE. And comment on it as you go along?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I am going to comment on it as I go along. That is just what I am going to do.

In support of the conclusion, first of the subcommittee and now of the whole committee, I filed an expression of my views upon this investigation. I prefer to read them myself, because—as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts—I may feel impelled to pause at times and comment upon my own report. No other person should be as capable as myself of commenting upon it accurately. I expressed myself to the committee, and I express myself to the Senate, as follows:

The subcommittee having reported to the whole committee in favor of ISAAC STEPHENSON, I desire to submit herewith the reasons which actuated me in arriving at that conclusion:

JURISDICTION.

On August 15, 1911, the United States Senate adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections or any subcommittee thereof be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, and report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON, as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin, there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices; that said committee or subcommittee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, to hold its session at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee or chairman of the subcommittee."

Pursuant to the authority given by said resolution the Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed a subcommittee, consisting of Senators HEYBURN, SUTHERLAND, BRADLEY, PAYNTER, and POMERENE, with full powers "to investigate said charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin relating to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin."

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE.

In performance of said duty the subcommittee met at Milwaukee, Wis., on October 2, 1911, in the Federal Building, a quorum of said subcommittee being present.

The chairman announced that the subcommittee would recognize a duly authorized representative of the State of Wisconsin, in view of the fact that the State had submitted through its governor to the Senate of the United States the charges to be investigated. No one appearing, the chairman then instructed the secretary of the subcommittee to communicate with the governor and attorney general of the State and advise them that the committee was in session in Milwaukee for the purpose of investigating the charges aforesaid, and to inquire whether or not the State desired to be represented at the hearing, and, pursuant to such instruction, the secretary sent the following communication to the governor.

Here I would remind the Senate that it was the State of Wisconsin, acting officially through its governor, that advised the United States Senate of the necessity or propriety of this investigation. We had a right to expect that the party bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate, whether it be a State or an individual, would follow it up by the production of at least some evidence in support of the charges that set in motion the power of this body to investigate the title to his seat of one of its Members.

So this is the communication sent to the governor:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., October 2, 1911.

Hon. FRANCIS E. MCGOVERN,
Governor of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.:

A subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate, duly appointed, with instructions to investigate the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, as recommended by the Legislature of Wisconsin as provided in joint resolution 58 of said legislature, has entered upon the investigation in the Federal building, in the city of Milwaukee. As the State appears to be unrepresented by counsel, you are requested to advise the committee whether or not it is the desire of the State to be represented by counsel before this committee, and if so, designate in writing such person to represent the State.

W. B. HEYBURN, Chairman.

To which communication the governor replied as follows:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Madison, Wis., October 3, 1911.

Hon. W. B. HEYBURN,

Chairman Subcommittee of the United States Senate

Committee on Privileges and Elections, Milwaukee, Wis.

In the absence of any specific authority conferred by this joint resolution, the only other possible source is chapter 268 of the laws of Wisconsin for the year 1911. Careful consideration of this statute leaves me in doubt as to whether it confers power upon me to employ at the expense of the State counsel to attend the investigation your subcommittee is now conducting. Nor can I see that much good is likely to come from such employment. Your invitation comes so late as practically to preclude the possibility of anyone whom I might select rendering any real service to your committee or materially assisting in the investigation now in progress. That investigation has already begun. The transactions to be inquired into are numerous and involved, as appears from the fact that the testimony already taken occupied many months of the time of committees of the State legislature and now fills a number of large volumes of printed reports. To be of service counsel for the State should have been employed months ago.

I will pause there to say that of course no action was possible on the part of the subcommittee until they had organized and been authorized to enter upon this investigation, and had any suggestion been made that the State needed further time, the committee, of course, stood ready to grant such further time as they might think was necessary. But it so happened that the attorney general of the State was as familiar with this case, having gone all through the former investigation, as he could have been at the end of any time that might have been given him.

I say this with no feeling of personal responsibility in the matter for the reason that until your telegram came yesterday there was no ground for anticipating that the appearance of an attorney for the State at this hearing would be acceptable to your committee. Indeed, more than a week ago, under date of September 25, the Associated Press quoted you as having expressed yourself, as chairman of the subcommittee, as follows: "The State of Wisconsin will not have an attorney in the investigation of the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON by the United States Senate committee. This hearing is under the jurisdiction of the United States Senate, which does not recognize the State as a party to the investigation. This is an investigation, not a trial."

That has just about as much accuracy in it as the ordinary average statement made by such representatives of the great public.

An additional reason why I should not avail myself of your invitation at this time is furnished by the practice of other committees charged with duties similar to yours. So far as I know, no State has been represented by counsel at any of these investigations. The work has been done either by the members of the committee alone or by counsel of their own choosing. At any rate, the responsibility for a thorough, searching inquiry is upon your subcommittee, acting as the agent of the United States Senate, in determining a question relative to the "election, returns, and qualifications" of one of its own Members. Neither the State of Wisconsin nor its legislature desires to assume the rôle of prosecutor or to sustain any other relation to this investigation than that of petitioner for a thorough, fearless, and impartial inquiry.

For the present, therefore, I shall take no action concerning the matter mentioned in your telegram. Assuring you, however, of my appreciation of your consideration in extending the invitation, I am,

Very truly, yours,

FRANCIS E. MCGOVERN.

It is not signed officially; it is a personal communication.

The chairman inquired whether or not—

Now, I come back to the proceedings of the committee—

The chairman inquired whether or not counsel were present to represent Mr. STEPHENSON. Whereupon Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, Mr. W. E. Black, and Mr. H. A. J. Upham appeared on his behalf and were recognized by the committee.

The joint resolution and specific charges certified to the United States Senate by the governor of Wisconsin were then read. (Transcript, pp. 4 and 5.)

Referring to the page of transcript:

Before entering upon the examination of witnesses by the committee Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, of counsel for Mr. STEPHENSON, requested leave to make a statement, which leave was granted. (Transcript, pp. 6-23.)

Reference is made to the transcript where such statement will be found:

The subcommittee then proceeded to the examination of witnesses and documents, which examination occupied 25 days, during which time 116 witnesses were sworn and examined, 36 affidavits received, and upward of 2,100 pages of printed testimony taken, which testimony, affidavits, and exhibits are herewith offered as a part of the report of the subcommittee.

The subcommittee was directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against Mr. STEPHENSON. These charges were set forth in the communication of the governor of Wisconsin, and the papers accompanying the same, certified to the United States Senate, among which was the joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Wisconsin on June 26, 1911, which is found on page 2 of the transcript.

The charges referred to in the resolution under which the subcommittee acted are as follows:

Now, these charges are worthy of especial consideration because they are the statement of alleged facts upon which this whole investigation rested, and they were made by a member of the Senate of the State of Wisconsin who was present throughout this investigation, and who was called upon by the committee time and again to know whether or not he had anything further to offer in support of the charges that he had made, to which he replied that he had not.

There was no star-chamber proceeding in this investigation. There was opportunity and space for everyone who desired to be acquainted with the proceedings. A knowledge of these charges is necessary to the understanding of that upon which you must vote. You could no more disregard them than you could the indictment in a court upon which you were trying the party charged. It is quite probable that a very small percentage of the Members of the Senate have had occasion or inclination to read these charges, and it is more than a presumption that they desire to know what the charges are upon which this investigation is based. They are, perhaps, as drastic in their nature as any charges upon which any man ever stood indicted. They are such that if the party charged were found guilty as charged no penalty would be too severe to inflict upon him either before this tribunal or the courts of law. I therefore feel that no apology is necessary for the reading of these charges. I want the Senators who are going to vote upon this question to hear them. I want them to hear these charges because in the performance of their duty they can not disregard them. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Dixon	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Borah	du Pont	McLean	Smith, Md.
Bourne	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Bryan	Gardner	Nixon	Stephenson
Burnham	Guggenheim	Oliver	Swanson
Burton	Heyburn	Overman	Thornton
Chilton	Hitchcock	Page	Tillman
Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Townsend
Crawford	Jones	Poinexter	Warren
Cullom	Kenyon	Pomerene	Wetmore
Cummins	Kern	Rayner	Williams
Curtis	Lea	Shively	Works
Dillingham	Lodge	Simmons

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. WATSON] is necessarily absent from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to inquire for the presence of the officer of the Senate who was directed to bring this document before the Senate. It comes without any explanation. We must have some control—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The printing clerk brought the document to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not printed. I want to know why. It was ordered printed more than a week ago. I want to know why an officer of the Senate does not obey its instructions. I serve this notice. I will proceed, but he had better take notice of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to answer the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I ask that he be brought to the bar of the Senate. I ask the Sergeant at Arms to bring him to the bar of the Senate and let us find out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Bring whom to the bar of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms would hardly be justified in bringing anyone to the bar of the Senate, except by direction of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms bring the printing clerk to the bar of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to bring the printing clerk to the bar of the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will speak on it in this connection. We have a rebellious majority, evidently, who glory in some underling of this body disobeying its orders, and they will sit here and vote, perhaps, in that way from motives that they would not care to justify on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely want to make this remark, that in justice to the Senate itself the Senator ought not to rebuke us without our knowing what we are being rebuked about.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, did Senators know what they were voting for?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is a summary motion to bring somebody to the bar of the Senate, because, as charged by the Senator from Idaho, he has neglected some duty. He did not deign to tell us what the evidence was upon which he founded that conclusion; he did not deign to tell us how he arrived at the conclusion; and we naturally solved the doubt which was in our minds in favor of the defendant.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I think you would in any event.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will show a good reason for bringing anyone to the bar of the Senate I shall vote to bring him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not apt to give the Senator an opportunity to justify his vote. When a Senator will vote on the confessed statement that he did not know what he was voting on, he shall have the comfort of dwelling on that vote until the end of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will permit a little further interruption, I did not say that I confessed I did not know what I was voting upon. I asserted the Senate did not know what it was voting on itself, which is a totally different proposition. Here was a motion made abruptly, spasmodically, volcanically, all at once, to bring somebody to the bar of the Senate, and no reason was given for it, except a general statement that he had neglected to print something, I believe. I understood just what the Senator from Idaho said; and I said what the Senator from Idaho said did not furnish a sufficient basis for what he demanded.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the printing clerk and all other underofficers of the Senate are subject to the control and direction of this body. On a former occasion, now practically a week ago, the printing authority, whoever it may be, was directed to print this record, and they have postponed it and delayed it for reasons of their own which will not commend themselves to Members of this body.

The record ordinarily would have been printed in 24 hours, but because of some stubbornness on the part of some of those underlings, they have not printed the first volume of this record. They have printed the second volume. Now, it is a question of whether they obey the orders of the Senate or whether Senators sit here and vote "no" when a Senator in charge of a measure under consideration asks that a subofficer be brought here to say why he has not complied with the order of the Senate. That would be a fine condition of affairs in a country lyceum, but in the Senate of the United States it is unbecoming.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was one of the Senators who voted "no." [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, a point of order—

Mr. CUMMINS. I wanted to ask—

Mr. HEYBURN. I rose to a point of order. I ask, Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not a question of yielding. I rose to a point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho is already on the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have a serious question on to-day—I will yield to the Senator in a moment—but before we enter upon it I want it understood by the occupants of the galleries of this body that there are not to be expressions of approval or disapproval through laughter or giggling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. The Senator from Idaho moves that the printing clerk, as I understood him, should be brought before the bar of the Senate to explain why volume 1 of the testimony in the Stephenson case has not been printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; to explain to the Senate why he had not obeyed its orders.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not understand that, according to the practice of the Senate—and I have been here but a short while, and am not so familiar with that practice as is the Senator from Idaho—the printing clerk, if brought before the bar of the Senate, would have any right to enter upon an oral explanation of the performance or nonperformance of his duty.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator misunderstands the practice of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that the Senate must proceed in quite a different way, if it desires to enforce its order upon any employee of the Senate. I voted against the motion because I believed it to be wholly out of order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I would inquire, Mr. President, how the Senator would proceed to bring one of the employees of the Senate to an account?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not going to attempt an explanation of the practice, because I am not familiar with it, but I do know that an employee of the Senate would have no right to stand here and address the Senate upon any question.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that there must be some charge preferred against any officer or employee of the Senate, to which he would have a right to respond; and then, when the testimony was taken upon the charge, it could be laid before the Senate; the issue would be decided, and then the Senate would enter whatever order it pleased to enter upon the showing so made. That is the way it seems to me the Senate must proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. There has been more than one examination at the bar of this body. The Senate is not helpless in the hands of anybody; and it may bring any person to its bar in any way that it elects to do it. There is no danger of them being permitted to make speeches to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I do not intend to encourage the practice of calling before the Senate anyone who is accused of disobeying its orders in order to permit him to enter upon an oral explanation of why he has done or why he has not done a particular thing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. I may take more drastic measures in this matter perhaps than asking him to explain, in which case he will wish he had explained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; for a purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in justification of the act of the printing clerk, I wish to make this short statement: The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections submitted by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] makes this statement:

Mr. HEYBURN, chairman of the subcommittee, submitted a statement of his views in support of the conclusions reached, and on the request of members of the committee further consideration of the matter was postponed to February 3, 1912, on which date a further postponement was had to February 10, 1912, with the understanding that any member of the committee might file a statement of his views to accompany the final report of the committee, and that a vote might be taken on that date.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well?

Mr. SMOOT. The printing clerk has been waiting for those views. They were submitted to the Senate to-day. All of the other part of the report has been printed at the Government Printing Office with the exception of the part of the report that is filed to-day, and that is now at the Printing Office. The complete report will be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will allow me—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator contend that that is a question on which an officer of the Senate has the right to pass? The Senate makes an order that a certain document is to be printed. Very well. It is the duty of the clerks of the Senate to have it printed; it is not their duty to hold it up and wait. The Senate order was unconditional.

Mr. SMOOT. The original order to print?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not seen a copy of it. Has the Senator asked for an order from the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me ask the Senator a question. I may possibly get a glimmer of light. Is the Senator from Utah, as a member of the Printing Committee, responsible for this work being held up?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I knew nothing about the matter until the Senator from Idaho asked the Secretary of the Senate to order the printing clerk to produce the volume.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, the Senate made an order to print. Now, it seems to me it is the duty of the officers of the Senate to carry out that Senate order. And if the views of the minority or those of any member of the committee are not ready they should be notified that under the order of the Senate the printing is to take place. Those views could be added at the end just as well as at the beginning.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true, but the printing clerk a few moments ago stated to me that the views of other members of the committee who had permission to file such views had not been filed for printing in this volume.

Mr. LODGE. It is the action of the committee which the Senator has read; it is not the action of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if the Senate has ordered any part of this report printed other than when reported as a full report?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; they did on my request when I filed the report; and the things to be printed were the things that were then before the Senate, and not something that might or might not ever come before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The report has been already printed, and the Senator has read from it. Now, what the Senator submitted as a report has been printed, and every Senator has it. As I understand, the report that was ordered printed has been printed, and in that printed report it is stated:

With the understanding that any member of the committee might file a statement of his views, to accompany the final report of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. That has been filed and printed. Nobody is talking about that. That is not what is being talked about at all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand it, the order carried the testimony. Now, what has been held back is the testimony.

Mr. SMOOT. The testimony has been held back awaiting the report.

Mr. LODGE. In whose discretion does it lie to hold back that testimony when the Senate ordered it to be printed?

Mr. SMOOT. It lies in the Senate's discretion, if the Senate has ordered it printed.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate certainly ordered the testimony printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, then, if the Senate has ordered the testimony printed, the printing clerk is wrong.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course he is wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. But if the Senate has not ordered the testimony printed, then he is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I have had in my office for the last two days a copy of the testimony—the first and second volumes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not the Senate print; that is the committee print.

Mr. BORAH. It is the evidence and hearings.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but it is the committee print. The committee, of necessity, had to have the testimony printed.

Mr. SMOOT. The testimony has already been printed for the committee, but I take it for granted that the printing clerk thought it having already been printed, in order to have the final report printed he must have the views of the minority and majority printed together.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to hear read the order of the Senate in regard to the printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what took place at the time the report was presented.

The Secretary read from page 1953 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, 1912, as follows:

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 215), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of the report and accompanying papers presented by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were directed to investigate whether corrupt methods and practices were used or employed in the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that 450 additional copies of the report, together with the hearings held before the committee, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I think I am correct in my statement that the order is an unconditional order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no question but what it is an unconditional order.

Mr. LODGE. Being an unconditional order, I do not think it was in the discretion of the printing clerk to hold it up for any reason. If there was material lacking in it, he should have brought that to the attention of the Senator in charge, and it should have been brought to the Senate, but it seems to me that there was no discretion there to be exercised.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would say, Mr. President, that the printing clerk of this body came to me in regard to this matter, and I instructed him exactly as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has expressed himself; that there was no discretion in him; that it was his business to print this record and have it here. He promised me to have it here this morning, but he has evidently been getting some outside advice, and has assumed to disobey the order of this body.

Now, I will not pursue this question further. It is not necessary that I should. Of course, any other Senator is at liberty to do as he pleases at this time.

Mr. LEA. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LEA. Have sufficient copies of the testimony been printed and been delivered to all the Members of the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. The print was a committee print. Of course—

Mr. LEA. Were there not sufficient copies?

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. The print, under the Senate order, could not be commenced until after the Senate had acted upon the resolution which has just been read. A committee print was ordered, and the Senate had copies of that print sufficient for the consideration of the case up to the time that the Senate should take it up.

Mr. LEA. Were not sufficient copies printed for all Senators to have the testimony?

Mr. HEYBURN. There were not a sufficient number for all Senators, but I have not had to decline the request of any Senator. I have had enough copies to supply any Senator who has requested one.

Mr. LEA. I understood the Senator to make the statement on last Tuesday that every Member of the Senate had had for some weeks a copy of the testimony, with the digest which had been sent from the committee room. Under that view of the case it seems to me that the resolution providing that the testimony, with the report and accompanying papers, should be printed would mean that one of the accompanying papers would be the views filed by the minority, and therefore the document could not be printed until those views had been filed.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no such document recognized in legislative affairs as a "minority report." It has no status. It is merely the dissent expressed by those who do not agree to the report of the majority.

Mr. LEA. I thought it might, at least, be classified as "accompanying papers."

Mr. HEYBURN. But "accompanying papers" referred to papers then in existence. Can anyone suggest the reason why Senators stand up and defend a disobedient servant of the Senate who has not performed his duty? What is the motive that actuates them to do that kind of thing? Is it because they feel resentful or spiteful toward somebody, or is there a principle involved with which they are well acquainted, representing the rights between a subordinate officer of this body and a Senator of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the RECORD containing the resolution that was just read by the Secretary of the Senate. Following that resolution the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] said:

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to say that the minority report from the committee is not yet signed, owing to the absence from the city of some of the Senators. But it will be signed and presented later in the week.

Mr. REED. When signed, will the minority report be printed under the resolution just reported?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; the minority report will be printed.

On that, as well as what was contained in the report—

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, just let us not go ahead and make a mistake here—

Mr. SMOOT. The printing clerk withheld the final report until the minority report was printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. This young man has evidently been acting under some antagonistic advice for some purpose that I am not capable of discovering. The action the Senator had just referred to is the action taken by the Senate this morning. The Senate this morning did just exactly what I told the Senator from Iowa that it would do when the minority report came in—they ordered it printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. I prefer now, if the Senator holds—well, I will not say that—

Mr. SMOOT. Just to clear the thing up, Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator can restrain himself until some day when he has an opportunity and the right of the floor to defend this disobedient official, let him do it in his own time. I am not going to stand here to speak in regard to this matter with special counsel for the man I charge with disobedience of an order of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not a word to say if the Senator—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield no more.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator does not wish to yield I have not another word to say.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not like the spirit.

Now, Mr. President, I desire that Senators should hear the indictment read, upon which they are going to try the case of Mr. STEPHENSON, and for that reason I requested the call that has been made and responded to. The other unpleasant incident has unfortunately arisen from the necessity of having the record before the Senate. This is the indictment—"Specific charges," it is headed—by John J. Blaine, State senator from the State of Wisconsin. Now, listen to the charges upon which you are going to pass when you vote:

SPECIFIC CHARGES.

1. That ISAAC STEPHENSON, of Marinette, Wis., now United States Senator and a candidate for reelection, did, as such candidate for reelection, give to one E. A. Edmonds, of the city of Appleton, Wis., an elector of the State of Wisconsin and said city of Appleton, a valuable thing, to wit, a sum of money in excess of $106,000, and approximating the sum of $250,000, as a consideration for some act to be done by said E. A. Edmonds, in relation to the primary election held on the 1st day of September, 1908, which consideration was paid prior to said primary election, and that said ISAAC STEPHENSON was at the time of such payment a candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator at such primary, and did by such acts as above set forth violate section 4543b of the statutes.

He leaves himself a margin for his guess of the difference between $106,000 and $250,000! When on the witness stand in this investigation, under oath, he said he had no personal information in regard to that charge, and declined to be responsible for the production of any proof or evidence to support that allegation which had been sent to this body as a basis, among other charges, for the investigation.

2. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, prior to said primary, pay to said Edmonds above-mentioned sums with the design that said Edmonds should pay to other electors of the State, out of said sums above mentioned and other sums of money received by said Edmonds from said ISAAC STEPHENSON prior to said primary, sums ranging from $5 per day to $1,000 in bulk, as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to said primary by said electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON as such candidate, in violation of said section.

Mr. Blaine upon the witness stand disclaimed any knowledge of any fact upon which he made that charge; but he said, in general terms, that he made it upon newspaper statements and general rumor.

The third charge in the indictment is:

3. That with full knowledge and with instructions from said ISAAC STEPHENSON, as to how and for what purposes said sums were to be expended, said sums were so paid as above stated to said Edmonds by said ISAAC STEPHENSON and that said sums were paid as above stated for the purposes above stated and also for the purpose of bribing and corrupting a sufficient number of the electors of the State of Wisconsin to encompass the nomination of said ISAAC STEPHENSON at said primary for the office of United States Senator.

And under oath that man said he had no knowledge whatever, either before making the charge or at the time of the investigation, upon which to base such a charge; that he made it upon newspaper statement and general rumor; but he did not claim to be able to point the committee to any source of information whatever. At a later period in the consideration of this question we will apply his testimony more specifically to those statements of unreliability.

The fourth charge in the indictment is:

4. That in pursuance of the purposes and design above stated said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, pay to one U. C. Keller, of Sauk County, an elector of this State, the sum of $300 as a consideration for some act to be done by said Keller for said STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

Mr. Blaine testified that he had absolutely no personal knowledge whatever in regard to that matter, and he did not undertake to produce before the committee any witness by whose testimony he might sustain the allegation; and yet it is a charge of corruption and bribery against a Member of this body, by a man who was a member of the State Senate of Wisconsin.

The fifth charge in the indictment is:

5. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, paid to one Hambright, of Racine, Wis., large sums of money as a consideration for some act to be done by said Hambright for said STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary—

Mark you, "preliminary to said primary"— said Hambright being then an elector of this State, corruptly and unlawfully.

Of course, had we taken up this matter as by demurrer to an indictment, it never would have left the Senate. The demurrer would have been sustained. It would have been sustained by the votes of the lawyers and, in so plain a case, by the votes of those who are not lawyers.

6. That in further pursuance of the purposes and design above stated said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, by and through his agents, prior to said primary—

"Prior to said primary"— pay to one Roy Morse, of Fond du Lac, Wis., then an elector of this State, the sum of $1,000 as a consideration for some act to be done by said Morse for said ISAAC STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, and corruptly and unlawfully.

I know the lawyers, in fact all the Members of this body, will quickly analyze an expression of that kind, that is sought to be made so as to avoid responsibility on the part of the maker.

7. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary—

Mark you, these charges are all "prior to said primary"; and they will all depend, so far as their application is concerned—supposing that they have any—to the doing of acts in connection, not with an election, but with a primary, where it is sought to select a United States Senator; where it is sought to give binding force and effect to the acts of a direct primary in the selection of a United States Senator, in the absence of any law authorizing a United States Senator to be selected at a primary.

Said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, paid to divers persons, then electors of the county of Grant, Wis., ranging from $5 per day and upward, as a consideration for some act to be done by said several electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

We have not gotten beyond the primary yet; we have not gotten down to it.

8. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design, said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, did pay to divers persons who were at such time electors in this State a consideration for some act to be done for said ISAAC STEPHENSON by such electors preliminary to such primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

We are still not down to the nomination of anybody. We are not yet down to the primary.

9. That in further pursuance of such purposes and designs said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, did pay to electors of this State, who were of a different political opinion and who held to other political principles than those of the Republican Party, more particularly Democrats, sums of money as a consideration for some act to be done by such electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

10. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to such primary, did offer to pay to Edward Pollock, of Lancaster, Wis.—

did offer to pay to Edward Pollock, of Lancaster, Wis., certain sums of money, as editor of the Teller, a newspaper published in said city of Lancaster, Wis., and to other editors of newspapers who were at such time electors of this State, and for the purpose of purchasing the editorial support of such editors and as a consideration of something to be done relating to such primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

A charge of the purchase of rainbows—editorial support before a primary at which there was no authority to do anything pertaining to the election of a United States Senator! And Mr. Blaine charges here, as a basis for unseating Senator STEPHENSON, that this man paid money for the editorial support of these newspapers! If that were established, I do not know how I would stand on a vote upon a question of competency, for a man who would pay for the editorial support of such papers, with the idea that any elector's judgment would be swayed thereby, would be of questionable judgment.

11. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, prior to such primary—

Mark you, "prior to such primary"— by and through his agents, promise and agree to pay to one Lester Tilton, a then resident and elector of this State, and residing at the city of Neillsville, Wis., a sum in excess of $500 to procure or aid in procuring the nomination of said Lester Tilton to the assembly of this State from Clark County, and did offer to give to said Lester Tilton a sum in excess of $500 if said Lester Tilton would become a candidate for the assembly from said Clark County if said Lester Tilton would support said ISAAC STEPHENSON for the office of United States Senator, all of which is in violation of sections 4542b and 4543b of the statutes.

On the investigation of that charge it proved to be so absolutely without foundation that no one seemed inclined to stand responsible for it. In the first place, the man was not elected to the legislature, and if he was a candidate for it at all it was known only to himself. That Senator STEPHENSON's agent should pay him $500 to become a candidate would be some evidence of the fact that Senator STEPHENSON did not get anything if he paid for it.

We are near the end of these charges:

12. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, by and through his agents, give and promise and pay or agree to pay to other electors of this State sums of money to procure or aid in procuring the nomination of such electors to the senate and assembly of this State other than those electors residing in the district where said ISAAC STEPHENSON resides.

That is based upon a provision in a statute of Wisconsin, which undertakes to say that a candidate for office may not contribute to the election expenses of anyone who does not reside in his district. There was absolutely no proof offered in support of it, although every effort was made to find some one who would have something to say for or against any or all of these charges.

13. That E. M. Heyzer and Max Sells, prior to said primary, being at such time employees of the Chicago & North Western Railway Co., a corporation doing business in this State, did contribute and agree to contribute free services as such employees for the purpose to defeat the candidacy of former Assemblyman E. F. Nelson, from the district embracing Florence, Forest, and Langlade Counties, for the nomination for assemblyman from said district, all of which was done with the knowledge and consent and under the direction of said ISAAC STEPHENSON, his agents, and employees, contrary to chapter 492, Laws of 1905.

Those men were placed on the witness stand, and they did not even know that a contest was being made over this question. The attempt made to sustain this charge absolutely failed, not by insufficient proof, but for want of any proof. The examinations upon these charges were all conducted in the presence of the men who made them; and they were there, as it were, superintending the investigation of the charges they had undertaken to sustain, or had made, against Mr. STEPHENSON.

14. That in further pursuance of the purposes and design above set forth, said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, did, in addition to paying certain sums as above set forth, offer and agree to pay to electors of this State, prior to said primary, a premium or bonus to those who in his employ carried their respective precincts in such primary for said ISAAC STEPHENSON as such candidate.

Not a word of proof was offered in support of that statement, and it was testified to as being absolutely without foundation.

15. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON, if claiming an election by virtue of receiving a plurality of votes at such primary, then said ISAAC STEPHENSON has violated chapter 502 of the laws of 1905 by failing and neglecting to file his expense account as provided by said chapter.

That presupposes that the State has authority to require a candidate, or a man who thinks he is a candidate, for the United States Senate to file an account. Senator STEPHENSON filed an account which was in form and substance such as other candidates had justified themselves in filing. It was testified, if I remember correctly, by the attorney who drew it that it followed the account of expenses that was filed by the judge of the supreme court of the State at the same election. The attorney who drew it took the statement of the judge of the supreme court as a model from which to draw the account for Senator STEPHENSON.

But the only penalty prescribed for the failure to file an account, or the filing of an imperfect account, is a fine under the State law; and we are not here enforcing fines under the State law. He seems to have been candid enough to state, under oath, that he expended this large sum of money. He has not been trying to hide it from anybody or to shift the responsibility.

Now comes the last one. This is the sixteenth:

16. Charging generally the primary nomination or election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON was obtained by the use of large sums of money corruptly and illegally, by the violation of sections 4542b, 4543b, and 4478b of the statutes relating to illegal voting, bribery, and corruption, and other laws above set forth relating to elections and primary elections.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, February 19, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, let Thy kingdom come in all our hearts, that we may think pure thoughts, speak kind words, do noble deeds.

"Charity thinketh no evil."

"A soft answer turneth away wrath."

A good deed touches the hearts of men.

"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Where love is, God is. Help us, therefore, we beseech Thee, to keep the eleventh commandment in our hearts this day. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following credentials, which were read:

Know all men by these presents:

That I, Richard E. Sloan, governor of the Territory of Arizona, by authority of the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1910, and the joint resolution of Congress approved August 21, 1911, as supplemented by ordinance No. 2, adopted by the constitutional convention of Arizona, do hereby certify that, as shown by the returns of the election held on the 12th day of December, 1911, as canvassed and certified to me by the canvassing board in accordance with said act, joint resolution, and ordinance No. 2, Carl Hayden was a candidate at said election for the office of Representative in Congress and, of all the various candidates for said office, received the highest number of votes therefor and was therefore elected to said office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the Territory of Arizona to be affixed.
Done at the city of Phoenix, the capital, this 3d day of February, 1912.

RICHARD E. SLOAN.

GEORGE YOUNG,
Secretary of Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

BANKING AND CURRENCY CONDITIONS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution No. 411 to investigate banking and currency conditions, have had the same under consideration and report the following resolution as a substitute therefor, with the recommendation that it do pass:

Whereas the Committee on Banking and Currency is vested with the power to propose to the House all legislation relating to banking and currency; and

Whereas said committee is desirous of securing full and complete information regarding the banking and currency conditions of the country for the purpose of determining what legislation is needed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to employ experts, counsel, accountants, and clerical and other assistants.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas during the session or recess of Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the previous question on the resolution, but pending the putting of the motion I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] if we can not make some agreement as to the time for discussion.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman, first, if this is the resolution as it was reported by the committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is the resolution that is reported by the committee, with the provision relating to expenditures out of the contingent fund stricken out.

Mr. DALZELL. Until we can make some arrangement about debate, I shall reserve the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is stricken out of the resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. I shall reserve a point of order until we can see what we can do about the time for debate. How much time for debate will the gentleman agree to?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. As I understood the gentleman, it was agreeable that this should be stricken out and considered as committee action.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly, if the gentleman is willing to agree to a reasonable debate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How much time would the gentleman like to have?

Mr. DALZELL. I should suggest an hour a side, at least.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that, if the gentleman will agree that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I would ask the gentleman whether he would not agree to this, that at the end of that time the gentleman from Texas shall be recognized to move the previous question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I could not make that agreement.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, if this agreement be made as the gentleman suggests, it shuts off any opportunity to amend the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman can move the previous question at the end of that time. There are some here—I presume a good many—who would, perhaps, vote for this resolution if it was the only one they could vote for, but who would prefer to amend it, and who, therefore, would be opposed to ordering the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that by an agreement of the House on Saturday it was understood that the business on Monday should be passed over until Thursday to give right of way to the consideration of the chemical schedule.

At the request of the gentleman from Texas I agreed to waive that right if this debate on this resolution did not take up an undue length of time; but I am perfectly willing to have the 2 hours, for with a roll call and 40 minutes' debate it would probably amount to 2 hours.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to call attention to the fact that I have reserved the point of order, and the length of the debate will depend upon the decision of the Chair if I insist on the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman insists on that, of course I will have to withdraw the resolution and reconvene the Committee on Rules; but I thought this could be regarded as committee action and there would be no objection to it on that account.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman will recall that I said to him this morning I concurred in that, providing we could make a reasonable arrangement as to discussion, and so I am willing now, but the gentleman from Wisconsin insists—and he has a perfect right to insist—that he shall have an opportunity to offer an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman will concede, at least, the right of Members to vote on the proposition of the previous question, because that would shut out amendment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I said to the gentleman from Texas it seems to me, and I think he wants to be fair in this matter, that he ought to give Members the right to vote on the previous question. Regardless of what the members of the Rules Committee might think, I would not feel disposed to let it pass without an objection if we can not have a vote on the previous question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman understands he would have the right to vote on the previous question now unless we can agree on the two hours.

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman wants to shut out all debate and amendment, I presume he has the power to do it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say I am not asking for a right to amend, but simply for the right to vote upon the previous question.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARDY. That is as to whether any opportunity will be given to amend this resolution by a motion to amend it upon the floor of the House?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Not if the previous question is ordered.

Mr. HARDY. If the previous question is not ordered, then what is the condition with reference to the right to amend?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why, of course, undoubtedly the resolution would be open to amendment and further discussion.

Mr. HARDY. Then the proper thing for those who want to amend the resolution is to vote against the previous question. Is that it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I would not like to say what the proper thing would be under such circumstances. I leave that to other gentlemen.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow one further inquiry and permit me to submit a question somewhat similar to that submitted by the other gentleman from Texas; and that is that a Member who is in favor of amending this resolution would have to vote against the previous question in order to get an opportunity even to offer his amendment?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order, under the circumstances, that this amendment eliminating certain language was not adopted at a meeting of the committee?

Mr. DALZELL. I shall feel inclined to insist upon my point of order unless we can come to an arrangement that will be satisfactory to both sides of the House relative to the discussion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. What arrangement would the gentleman suggest that would be satisfactory?

Mr. DALZELL. I have not any objection to waiving the question of order if we can have an hour's debate on each side, and after that the gentleman move the previous question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I could not agree to that. That agreement can not be made.

Mr. DALZELL. Then I shall insist on the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the resolution.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Frank C. Johnson, House bill 16829, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Pending that question I desire to see whether I can agree on general debate with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On account of the number of appropriation bills on the calendar, I would like to limit general debate to a few hours, if possible, and I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he is willing to agree to four hours' general debate—two hours on a side.

Mr. DALZELL. I could not agree to that. I have applications for time extending over that. I suggest that the gentleman allow the debate to run on for the present, and perhaps we can agree hereafter as to when it shall close, but I have applications for more time than would occupy two hours on this side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say to the gentleman that I would be glad to agree with him on a limitation of debate, if he desires to do so.

Mr. DALZELL. I would suggest four hours on a side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will compromise with the gentleman and say three hours on a side, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. DALZELL. Say three and one-half.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will run the session of the House this evening pretty late if we make it three and one-half hours. I want to finish the general debate to-day, and I think three hours on a side will let us through at half past 6, and that that will be more satisfactory.

Mr. DALZELL. I can not agree to that. I would rather the gentleman would let the debate run on. This is a very important measure, Mr. Speaker. We ought not to be cut off with a limited debate on a great tariff bill, a bill that has been prepared by the gentleman and his colleagues, but which we have had no opportunity at this time to know anything about.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If three and one-half hours' debate on a side, which makes seven hours of debate on the bill, is satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, pending the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to seven hours, three and one-half hours on a side, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and one-half by myself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if it is the intention of the gentleman to finish general debate to-day if that arrangement is entered into?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope so. I would like to do it. The pressure of appropriation bills is so great that I would like to ask the House to stay here to-night to finish general debate on this bill. I think the exigencies of the public business are such that the House ought to be willing to do so.

Mr. MANN. The exigencies of the public business in the middle of February of a long session of Congress are not sufficient to cause the gentleman to insist on the House remaining in session at night for general debate. Members have other work to perform.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to put my request.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to seven hours, three and one-half hours to be controlled by himself and three and one-half hours by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. HILL. If it is not too late, I object.

The SPEAKER. It is too late now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is too late.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20182, the chemical schedule.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20182, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

Mr. RUSSELL took the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in session in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 20182. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, Mr. HARRISON of New York was the chairman of the subcommittee that prepared this bill, and I desire to yield to him one hour to present the bill to the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in presenting to the House the Democratic revision of Schedule A, the tariff schedule dealing with chemicals, oils, and paints, I wish to call the attention of the House to the magnitude of the industries involved.

Chemicals and allied products in the census of 1910 showed $2,000,000,000 worth of capital invested, and nearly one and one-half billion dollars worth of products, with about $900,000,000 worth of raw materials. Our imports in 1910, under the head of "Chemicals and allied products," amounted to nearly $144,000,000 representing 9½ per cent of our total imports, and made the largest single class of imports coming into our country. Our export trade in these products has doubled from 1897 to 1906, showing a more rapid increase than does any other country in this respect. Our exports of chemicals in 1911 being nearly $39,000,000.

Our imports under Schedule A which were dutiable in 1911 under the Payne law were $48,869,000 worth, upon which we collected duties of a little more than twelve and one-half million dollars, at an average ad valorem rate of 25½ per cent. The imports estimated under our dutiable list of Schedule A for the fiscal year are $96,770,000, with duties estimated at $16,120,000, at an average ad valorem rate of 16½ per cent, showing an expected increase in revenues of at least three and one-half million dollars, with a reduction in the ad valorem rates of the dutiable list from 25½ per cent to 16½ per cent.

The products which were classed as chemical and allied products are, as to about two-thirds of their number, products which enter into further manufacturing processes, and only about one-third of the products involved are subjects of direct consumption by the public, so that as to two-thirds of the articles carried in the proposed Democratic revision the effect on the consumer will be felt by a reduction in the cost of manufacturing more highly finished products, which will intermediately cause a reduction in the cost of the products which the public consumes.

I wish to say a few words about the care which has been exercised in the preparation of this bill. In the recent past the Democratic Party has been subjected to considerable criticism, most of which, in my judgment, is insincere and for political purposes, to the effect that the Democratic tariff bills have been hastily prepared and without a thorough study of the subjects covered by them. I venture to say that as to all of the bills which we have presented to the House since the Democrats came into power that charge is not only untrue but that the exact reverse is true; that more care and consideration, both as to the revenue and to the consuming public, have been given to the preparation of the Democratic tariff bills than have been shown in the preparation of any other tariff for the past 20 years. But as to Schedule A particularly, I call to the attention of the House the fact that since last April a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means—the Democratic membership—has been engaged in the study of the articles covered by Schedule A and the rates thereon; that for the past three months the subcommittee has been almost continuously in session upon this subject; that the very efficient and skillful clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means and his assistants have been for some weeks at work night and day assisting the committee in the preparation of this bill; and that we have had, in addition, technical experts from the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, a chemical expert from the board of appraisers of the custom house at New York City, and a financial expert of the Treasury Department, who has helped us in preparing our estimates of expected revenues, and that the bill itself has been submitted to the Treasury Department for its consideration and for suggestions as to the administrative features of the bill. But more than this, and in addition, the Democratic membership of the Committee on Ways and Means in the preparation of this bill has had the benefit of the report of the Tariff Board on Schedule A. [Applause.]

The report of the Tariff Board consists of a glossary of the paragraphs of the existing law and, in addition, an economic review of the chemical industry in the United States, in Canada, in France, in England, and in Germany. The members of the Ways and Means Committee take this opportunity of expressing to the Tariff Board their appreciation of the very valuable assistance which this report has been to them in the preparation of their bill. When the Tariff Board made this report to us, no inquiry had been made by them into the supposed difference, if any, in the cost of production here and abroad, so that the Tariff Board documents published with this report refer solely to subjects which are of importance to all revisers of the tariff, whether Republican or Democratic.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman, in view of his explanation of the manner in which the committee came to frame its very comprehensive report, whether any hearings were given to people engaged in the businesses affected by the bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will answer that quite frankly. The subcommittee prepared a painstaking digest of every sentence and every syllable of the testimony given by all the witnesses on the chemical schedule before the Ways and Means Committee three years ago, and the subcommittee informed itself absolutely as to all of that testimony. In addition to that, such gentlemen as came to Washington and asked the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee for an opportunity to explain their views upon this subject were granted an informal meeting with the members of this committee, and the fullest latitude of statement was permitted to those gentlemen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then this subcommittee did actually hear from people interested in the business affected by the bill and to that extent operated a little differently from some of the other subcommittees that have already reported?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. O Mr. Chairman, my statement does not contain any suggestion as to what other subcommittees have done in the preparation of other tariff bills. My remarks are confined solely to the subject that I have myself, as a member of the subcommittee, had control of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman has been working industriously, and that is very commendable; but the letters of inquiry that have been coming in indicate that there are some matters in the bill that may not have been explained to the committee.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. When we come to the proper time in this debate, no doubt the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will enlighten the House concerning those things. Now I can not yield any further on this point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman yield—

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; if my friend will excuse me, I want to get into my argument.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a question for information. I would be glad to know if the hearings containing the statements of the manufacturers referred to by the gentleman before the subcommittee, or the Democratic members of the subcommittee, are in print?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. They are not.

Mr. CANNON. Then the balance of us can not have the same knowledge.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, from my own personal observation, that there was not one single shred of new information presented by those gentlemen that they did not present before the committee three years ago, which was printed at that time.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement of the careful consideration which has been given in the framing of this schedule. I wanted to inquire whether any such consideration was given to the framing of the chemical schedule on which we were required to vote last summer.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I stated on the floor at that time that I thought the chief merit of the chemical revision of last summer was that it was a revision downward, and that if the Ways and Means Committee ever had the opportunity of originating a bill of its own, it would be drafted upon somewhat different lines.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman did not think, then, that it had any other merit at all than that it was a downward revision—

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think that merit is overwhelming. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan (continuing). No matter what its effect might be upon the industry.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I want to inquire whether the gentleman claims that this bill is a downward revision?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I do, very decidedly. It is a very great reduction. I propose to go into that in a few minutes.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I think we might as well have an understanding at the start as to be compelled to correct misunderstandings in the future. The gentleman from New York does not intend to convey the idea by his statement that the Tariff Board has made any investigation of the chemical industry, except to prepare a glossary.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend—

Mr. HILL. I will amplify my question a little; I mean by that, any such investigation as they have made or any such report as they have made on the wool schedule, and as they are now preparing in relation to the cotton industry.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. So far as my personal observation goes, the report submitted by the Tariff Board on the chemical schedule is of much more value than that which they submitted on the wool schedule.

Mr. HILL. They have only submitted a glossary.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will invite the gentleman's attention to the report of the committee on this bill, and he will find it there.

Mr. HILL. It is simply a glossary.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It contains a report on the chemical industry in this country and other countries.

Mr. HILL. It is simply a glossary and not a report, because they have made no investigation.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman from Connecticut may state his side of the case in his own way, but he is not stating the facts.

Mr. HILL. I asked the gentleman a question: Whether he desired to have it understood that the Tariff Board has made a report aside from the glossary of the chemical industry?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think I have no difficulty in making myself understood by the other Members of the House, however difficult it may be for the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. I accept the rebuke in good faith and my question is in good faith also, and I think the gentleman from New York ought to answer it in good faith.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Which the gentleman from New York has done.

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman does he intend to have the country and the House understand that, aside from the glossary of the chemical industry, the Tariff Board has made any report on that schedule?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman from Connecticut will allow me to answer his question, I have already stated and will state again that the Tariff Board has made a report on the chemical schedule, including an extremely painstaking and carefully prepared glossary of each one of the articles affected by Schedule A, and in addition, a scientific and learned report upon the economic condition of the chemical industry in the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany.

Mr. HILL. To whom was the report made?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further upon that point. I ask the indulgence of the House for permission to proceed for a few minutes without interruption in order to conclude my statement as to the relation of the Tariff Board to this report.

Mr. HILL. To whom was the report made?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I decline to yield further. I do not wish to make the Tariff Board responsible for the rates in this bill. They are not so responsible. The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee are responsible both for the subjects of taxation in the bill and for the rates imposed upon them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in concluding my reference to the Tariff Board, I wish to express the gratitude of the committee for the extraordinarily able and intelligent assistance rendered to the committee by the technical expert of the Tariff Board, Dr. B.

Herstein, who is a man not only learned in chemistry but in the economic side of the chemical industry, and in the bearing that the rates at the customhouse will have upon that industry. He is a most valuable public servant, and I take pleasure in expressing publicly the satisfaction that the committee have had in securing his advice, in addition to all the other advice that I have enumerated.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. HILL. I fully concur with the gentleman, and I ask him whether the assistance that has been rendered has not been rendered as the individual opinion of Dr. Herstein, and for which the Tariff Board assumed no responsibility and for which they can not assume responsibility?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman that I take it that the individual opinion of the expert of the Tariff Board is the very best opinion that the Tariff Board could have given.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman does not answer my question. Has not the Ways and Means Committee been advised that it was not an opinion for which the Tariff Board held itself responsible?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, specifically not to make the Tariff Board responsible for this bill. The Tariff Board is not responsible for it, but the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee are responsible.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will not answer the question, I will ask him to permit the leader of the Democratic Party in the House to answer the question, whether he has not been so advised?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very glad to have the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] come to my assistance when I think I need it, but under the present circumstances I am not of that impression. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, after the high tribute which the gentleman has paid to the ability of the Tariff Board, does he not think the Tariff Board ought to be continued as a permanent institution?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that speaking individually, not speaking for the committee—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Nor the party.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I should be in favor of the creation of a board of technical experts, to be attached to the Ways and Means Committee of the House [applause on the Democratic side]; and I am not in favor of the continuation of a presidential board, however high the individual merits of the members of that board and however high the purposes of those members, if the board is to be continued to be used, as it has been in the past, for the purpose of impeding downward revision of the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan rose.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield any further on that point.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Massachusetts is a member of the committee, I yield with pleasure.

Mr. McCALL. I would ask the gentleman whether he thinks the report of the Tariff Board on the wool schedule impeded the downward revision of the wool schedule?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I do, and I think it was a mere pretense also. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, an investigation of the chemical industry in the United States discloses the fact that this industry, perhaps to a greater degree than any other one in the tariff, can stand upon its own feet, and need not fear invasion from the foreign manufacturers in that great class of chemicals which are the subject of either patents or secret processes. A very large proportion of the articles covered by Schedule A are manufactured either by a secret process or under a patent, and in both cases the existence of a monopoly is easily brought about. In some cases there is reason to fear that these monopolies are international; but, certainly, as to two branches of the chemical industry, monopolies exist in the United States to which the existing prohibitive tariff rates have afforded the opportunity to come into existence.

These two branches are unquestionably the manufacture of heavy chemicals and the manufacture of medicinal preparations. Medicinal preparations are the subject of about the tightest little combination of all. There have been five leading drug firms which sold to the retailer at about uniform prices, and which practiced all the familiar machinations of trusts when any outside manufacturer attempted to sell to those dealers at a cheaper rate. The same sort of combination has existed in the manufacture and production of heavy chemicals. These are more or less protected from foreign invasion because of their mere bulk and size. But all the same they have had prohibitive rates, and the manufacturers of heavy chemicals have also divided up their territory, fixed prices, and the customer who sought to buy of them must either pay their prices or starve.

As affecting the question of wages, I do not expect to hear the argument as to this schedule which gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have, in my judgment, fallaciously advanced in regard to other tariff reductions, because it appears from an analysis of the ratio of wages and salaries to the value of the products in chemical manufactures, as affected by the Payne tariff law, only 7½ per cent of the output was in salaries and 7¾ per cent in wages; and since our effective ad valorem average in this bill is about 15 per cent, or 100 per cent of the total wages and salaries paid, it will be obvious that the cry of reduction in wages can not be leveled at this bill. It will also appear from these tables that the number of establishments for manufacturing chemicals has increased, between 1900 and 1910, about 35 per cent. The capital invested, as also the value of products and the cost of raw materials, have practically doubled. The number of salaried officials, superintendents, and manufacturers was twice as great in 1910 as in 1900; the salaries of these employees have more than doubled, while the number of wage earners has increased only 31 per cent, or in a less ratio even than the number of establishments, although the average wage shows a slight increase, because the total wages paid have increased at a higher ratio than the number of wage earners.

I might say that these increases of salaries of officials represent largely salaries paid to former owners of small plants which have been absorbed in the process of consolidation and these gentlemen are now burdening the pay rolls. All that we have done in this bill is to cut into the inflated and illegitimate profits of the manufacturers and not into the wages of the workmen.

Mr. Chairman, the first time the chemical schedule came into existence was in the year 1883, and it is fair to say that from that day to this, during a period of 30 years in which the chemical industry of the United States has grown and expanded more rapidly in proportion than any other, Schedule A has received less attention than has any other schedule of the tariff. The schedule as it stands to-day is absolutely inadequate to meet the revenue necessities of the modern industry, and is full of absurd inconsistencies which this bill regulates. Many of the rates of the law are, and always have been, absolutely prohibitive, and that seems curious in view of the fact that before the tariff commission of 1883 Mr. Alexander Jones, the president of the American Chemical Manufacturers' Association, stated positively that even then the chemical industry was not in its infancy; and Mr. Henry Bowyer before that same commission testified—and he was the man who prepared the first census report on chemicals—that even at that time a 10 per cent ad valorem tax on the articles carried in this bill would more than offset the difference in the cost of production between our country and other countries. But in spite of that testimony and other important information to that effect, the rates were then fixed in many cases at absolutely prohibitive figures and they have remained so ever since. An absurd inconsistency in the bill was the tax on sulphuric acid. Now, this acid is the basis of many of the other chemical manufactures. It is of such importance that—I think it was Humboldt who said that the amount of the consumption of sulphuric acid by a nation was a measure of its advance in civilization.

Now, the tax laid upon this in the Payne law was $5 a ton, and that was done in spite of the fact that from the nature of the substance it is very difficult to import. It has been sold by a combination of manufacturers in the neighborhood of $20, where it has cost a little more than one-third of that amount to manufacture. This bill of ours places sulphuric acid on the free list, in the hope that importations may be stimulated and may break the manufacturers' ring. Another inconsistency of the Payne law was the taxing of tannic acid at 35 cents a pound and gallic acid, which is made out of tannic acid, at 8 cents a pound. This bill has corrected that. Another inconsistency in the present law which I will take up is the tax on yellow prussiate of potash at about 40 per cent ad valorem and potassium cyanide, which is made out of it, taxed at 12½ per cent ad valorem. Again, in the Payne law phosphorus was on the tax list and phosphoric acid, which is made out of phosphorus, was on the free list. This bill has reversed that process. Another matter which was in need of attention was the classification and taxation of coal-tar products. We at present import about two-thirds of the coal-tar products used in the manufactures in this country, and in order to readjust the revenue collected on the industry we have lowered the rate on the coal-tar dyes and colors from 30 to 25 per cent ad valorem, and on all other products of coal tar not specifically mentioned we have lowered the rate from 20 to 15 per cent ad valorem. On the other hand, many of the intermediate products or primary stages of distillation or manufacture of coal-tar products we have taken off the free list and have taxed at from 5 to 10 per cent ad valorem rates, an arrangement which we believe produces the first scientific revision of the coal-tar schedule ever seen in American tariff making. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On that point, is that not a complete change in policy with regard to raw material so far as the Democratic Party is concerned?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, I am very glad to have the gentleman ask the question, and I will answer him quite frankly. The furthest I am willing to go into the doctrine of free raw materials is that I am unwilling to lay a tax upon any so-called raw material the imposition of which will increase the cost of the necessities of life.

Now, I deny the suggestion that on any articles which are not necessities of life or any articles which are luxuries of life it is the Democratic theory that high prohibitive rates shall be left on top and that the manufacturer shall be given the raw material free, because with that process the manufacturer gets all the benefit and the public gets none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer one more question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not somewhat inconsistent—I want to get the gentleman's view, because it seems to be very important—to appeal for a reduction in the cost of living so far as imported raw materials are concerned, and then change the policy from the free admission of raw materials to that of imposing a duty of 5 per cent?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Neither the gentleman's premises nor conclusions are correct. We have not done any of the things he says we have done. In certain places in this bill we have laid a tax upon certain materials of manufacture which do not enter into the making of the necessities of life, but we have at the same time reduced the tariff rate upon the finished product, so that if the manufacturer attempts to unload on the American people the tax upon his materials of manufacture he will be met by importations from abroad, and the consuming public will be protected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is in favor of the reduction of the wool schedule?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I am.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman would also regard it as fair, if the wool schedule were reduced; so far as wool and wool manufactures are concerned, that there should be a corresponding reduction upon chemicals or other articles that enter into wool manufacture?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what this bill does, and if the gentleman will allow me to develop my argument he will see that is the case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I beg the gentleman will not harass me. I am soon coming to that point.

Now, taking up the subject of the method of taxation adopted in this bill, it will be immediately seen that the Democratic Ways and Means Committee have for the first time recommended to the House a bill carrying specific rates of taxation. Schedule A of the Payne law contains 83 paragraphs. Of those, 50 are straight-out ad valorem paragraphs, 8 have compound rates, and 25 only have specific rates. The Democratic bill contains only 76 paragraphs, owing to the thorough and complete classifications which the committee has undertaken, and of those 30 are specific, 10 are mixed, and 36 are ad valorem. It will be at once perceived that the Democratic committee, instead of adopting straight ad valorem rates, has extended the number of specific rates contained in the Payne bill in this schedule. And in explanation of that I would say that upon investigation pursued at the customhouse we ascertained that Schedule A, of all the schedules in the tariff, is the one to which ad valorem rates of taxation are least applicable. Now, the reason for that is that whereas most objects which come in at the customhouse can be visually differentiated from one another, chemicals can not be, as a general rule. They come in the form of gases, liquids, or solids, which it is difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish by the eye, or by the nose, or by taste, and the result is that an analysis has often to be made to determine the nature of the importation. Now, as an example of that, take a handful of red lumpy salts. The customs official can not tell by looking at it whether that is platinum chloride, which is worth $35 an ounce, or whether it is iron chloride, worth 5 cents a pound. In order to determine between the two, he has to make what he calls a qualitative analysis, which is a comparatively easy and simple process, but if these two chlorides are mixed together in the salts that come in, as is generally the case, it becomes necessary to determine not only which preponderates, but the value of that salt, and that is what would be required if you are to apply ad valorem rates of taxation. Then it becomes necessary to make a quantitative analysis, which is a difficult, expensive, and tedious process, and which is very uncertain in its final result, because the chemist not only feels the necessity of ascertaining the purity of the importation, but the uses to which it has to be put. The result of having had to do this so often in the past has been years of delay in the final payment of duties. In consequence, we have made 30 of our paragraphs carry straight specific rates.

On the other hand, in fixing those ad valorem rates which we have applied to the bill we have attempted to evade this difficulty in 12 cases—those in which it was thought necessary—by applying a specific minimum rate. For example, we have said that a certain commodity is to be taxed 25 per cent ad valorem, but not less than 2 cents per pound. This, it is believed, is a new departure in tariff taxation, and as to those articles which we tax ad valorem and which it is difficult to distinguish or differentiate, it is the best method to prevent fraudulent undervaluations and dumpings into the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the revenues of this bill have been increased, as I said, from $12,500,000, which they carried in the Payne law, to $16,200,000, as is estimated in the Underwood bill. The imports under our bill, it is estimated, will be double. This does not indicate that the increase of importations of articles which are now manufactured in the United States will be doubled, because the report shows that the increase of importations due simply to the lowering of the tariff rates will be from about $48,000,000 to $58,000,000, but the remaining $38,000,000, which it is expected will be imported into the United States, consists of subjects which have heretofore been upon the free list of the Payne law and upon which we have taxed at an average of 9.71 per cent.

The reason why the committee has taken this new departure in the framing of Schedule A is this: At least two-thirds of the objects covered by the Payne law under Schedule A come in free. These objects were almost exclusively those known as noncompetitive. In other words, they were objects not the growth or product or manufacture of the United States. For the most part they come from tropical countries and are used in the manufacture of other articles in the United States. No Republican was interested in protecting them, so they left them free.

Now, our party, which is pledged to a revision of the tariff so as to make it for revenue only has, in the preparation of this schedule, taxed some of these noncompetitive products, and, on the other hand, placed upon the free list the following articles, most of which are competitive. My time is so short, Mr. Chairman, that I will print these in my remarks instead of burdening the committee with them at present.

Mr. MANN. Well, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that most of the articles placed upon the free list in this bill are now on the dutiable list?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; I did not so state. I think the gentleman misunderstood me. I said we placed certain articles on the free list which have heretofore been upon the dutiable list. It appears that it would be better for me to read the list of these articles now. They are as follows: Acid, acetic or pyroligneous, chromic, sulphuric, or oil of vitriol; blue vitriol or sulphate of copper; borates of lime or soda, or borate material; charcoal in any form; bone char, blood char, copperas, or sulphate of iron; Paris green and London purple; phosphorus, santolin, salt cake, or niter cake; strychnia and strychnine, and sulphur.

We also cut all but a half dozen—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, when he says "sulphur," does not mean crude sulphur?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; sublimed sulphur.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman does not mean to make an incorrect statement.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. My time is so short that I did not give the title fully.

Mr. MANN. That is not our fault.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Now, we have in addition greatly lowered the duty on the competitive products in Schedule A—that is, the products manufactured in the United States, except for a few commodities in the most part habit-forming drugs, which I propose to discuss in a few moments.

As to these noncompetitive products coming from the East Indies, India, and Africa, the purest form of revenue taxation is that which is laid upon noncompetitive products. There can thus be no question whatever of incidental protection, because the duty paid at the customhouse goes into the Treasury of the United States outright, and the manufacturers of the United States do not put a corresponding amount in their own pockets.

It will thus be seen that the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means, in placing low taxes upon these noncompetitive products, heretofore free, has been able to take down the taxes elsewhere and has entered upon a policy which will make the burdens of taxation in the United States more evenly distributed, to the end that the consuming public shall not bear all of the weight of tariff taxation, but that some of the manufacturers of the United States shall bear their fair share of the burdens. Manufacturers under the system heretofore existing have had all of the benefits and none of the burdens. They have been taught to believe that the tariff was a benefit and that the people of the United States could make themselves richer by taxing themselves more. But this bill, by laying a tax upon materials used in the manufacture of toilet soaps and perfumes and varnishes and other luxurious objects, will compel the manufacturers of those products in the United States to shoulder their share of the burdens of tariff taxation. [Applause.]

In selecting from the free list articles for taxation careful attention has been paid in every instance to the uses to which the article was to be put; all those which enter into the manufacture of the necessities of life have been left on the free list, and only those which go to make up luxuries have been taxed. The rates have been made 20 per cent on the raw materials for making perfumes, about 10 per cent on varnish gums, and about 3 to 4 per cent on the tropical oils for making high-grade toilet soaps. And to prevent these manufacturers unloading upon the public the taxes upon these materials in the form of increased prices we have at the same time lowered the rates upon their finished products, so as to permit importations from abroad. In the case of perfumes, however, the Payne rates were retained as a revenue measure.

The suggestion to place these taxes upon the manufacturer has already created a storm of protest from these tariff-fed and immensely wealthy gentlemen.

In order that I may show that they have received some benefits from the bill as well as some burdens, I will point out that while the bill imposes a 3 to 4 per cent tax upon coconut oil, palm oil, palm-nut oil, and other oils which go into the manufacture of expensive toilet soaps, the soap industry receives compensation and benefit from other features of the bill, but not the kind of compensation that Republicans give, because the compensations we give are in the form of reduced taxation and not of increases.

The bill makes a reduction upon the following articles which enter into the manufacture of soaps: The second most important soap material is caustic soda, which we have cut from one-half of a cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent a pound; soda ash from three-quarters of a cent a pound to one-eighth of a cent a pound; glycerine, refined, from 3 cents a pound to 2 cents a pound; borax from 2 cents a pound to one-eighth of a cent a pound; castor oil from 35 cents a gallon to 20 cents a gallon; sodium silicate, which is of great importance to them, from three-eighths of a cent a pound to one-eighth of a cent a pound; sulphuric acid put on the free list; chalk from 41 per cent to 25 per cent; talcum from 35 per cent to 15 per cent; and linseed oil from 15 cents a gallon to 13 cents a gallon.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has indicated the reduction on articles that go into the production of soap. Does the bill propose to reduce the tariff on soaps?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It does very materially reduce the tariff on soaps.

Now, I will make a statement with reference to the manufacture of varnish. We have placed a low-revenue tax upon the East Indian and African gums, which enter into the manufacture of varnish, and upon China nut oil, which the varnish makers use. These are all noncompetitive products.

In addition, we have reduced the tax upon the following articles which the varnish makers use: Linseed oil from 15 cents a gallon to 13 cents a gallon; wood alcohol from 20 per cent to 6 per cent—that is to say, to 5 cents a gallon. The other solvents are cut equally; pyroxilin is reduced from 22 to 15 per cent.

And since the manufacturers of varnish are likewise generally manufacturers of paints, I will add that the following pigments are also cut: White lead, from 42 to 25 per cent; zinc white, from 46 per cent to 15 per cent; all other pigments, from 45 or 35 per cent to 20 per cent.

The committee report also states at length the very great cuts which have been made in the other materials of manufacture in great industries. The leather industry, for example, uses about $25,000,000 worth of materials annually which come under the head of chemicals. We have cut in half the duty on all of their tanning extracts, which compose the larger part of the chemicals they use in their industry.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman was speaking just a moment ago about the pigments used in the manufacture of paints. I have not had a chance to look at this particular bill, and I will ask the gentleman what has been done with barytes?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The duty on barytes was cut.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman for any length of time. Can the gentleman state from memory the amount of the reduction?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Barytes was the subject of an extended debate at the time of the last tariff revision. Barytes is the basic material in the manufacture of many paints and particularly the nonpoisonous paints, such as lithopone—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I know that is true.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The duty on barytes has been cut from an ad valorem equivalent of 61 per cent to 15 per cent, and on manufactured barytes from an ad valorem equivalent of 64 per cent to 20 per cent.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The Payne duty was $1.50 a ton.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; the ad valorem equivalent in the Payne law was 61 per cent, and we put it at an ad valorem of 15 per cent, adding the minimum of not less than 40 cents a ton, in order to prevent dumpings from abroad.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman interpret so that one not skilled in mathematical gymnastics may understand it? You cut it from $1.50 a ton to what?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The new ad valorem tax equals 40 or 50 cents a ton.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that I can not yield any longer, for I have only 10 minutes to make a number of statements which I think important, before I close.

Mr. MANN. Can not the gentleman get more time? We have some legitimate questions that we would like to ask.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, I will ask the gentleman in charge of the time for more time, and I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. I see that you have made a reduction on linseed oil from 15 cents to 13 cents a gallon. In a comparison with the reduction made on other oils I find that it is less on linseed oil than in most instances. The question I want to ask is, What was the reason for not making a greater reduction on linseed oil?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois asked that question. The reason was simply a revenue one; linseed oil is one of the largest producers of revenue. The Payne law cut it from 20 cents to 15 cents a gallon, and the Underwood bill cuts it from 15 cents to 13 cents. It is purely a revenue proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. It is known that there is a trust handling and manufacturing linseed oil, I suppose?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I am not sure of that; but I will say that until we come to the revision of the agricultural schedule and revise downward the tax upon flaxseed itself, which is now about 19 per cent ad valorem, we would not be justified in making a greater reduction, especially in view of the revenue feature which I have just stated, than the reduction to 13 cents a gallon.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it proposed to make a radical reduction in the linseed itself?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I hope there will be a reduction when we come to the agricultural schedule.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. The district I represent is largely interested in barytes. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill proposes a reduction of that duty from $1.50 to 40 cents a ton?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. That is substantially the reduction, although our rate is ad valorem.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is your proposed duty on manufactured barytes; what is the difference between your duty and the present duty?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The ad valorem equivalent is from 64 per cent to 20 per cent, substantially the same as the raw material.

Before leaving the subject of paints I want to call attention to the fact that we have made a very great reduction in paints, pigments, and varnishes. The paint manufacture in the United States is one of the most highly developed industries, and immense quantities of paints and varnishes are exported. The present tariff has permitted less than 1 per cent of the consumption to be imported. The prohibitive rate which exists permits the paint manufacturers of the United States to charge extortionate prices. In many places throughout the country districts you can see barns and farmhouses that have not been painted for years, because the price of paint is too high. We have cut the tax on the finished products of paints from 30 to 20 per cent, and upon the pigments, which are of the kind that farmers use, in the following rates: Venetian red from 30 per cent to 20 per cent, zinc white from 40 per cent to 15 per cent, lead pigments from 60 per cent to 25 per cent; and there is a 13 per cent cut in linseed oil. Paints are for the first time put on a competitive basis, and prices will come down.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from New York has finished with the paint item perhaps he will allow me to ask him a question in reference to soap.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman state what the tariff is now on plain toilet soap, and what it will be under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that we have reclassified the soap schedule, because it was found that the law as it stood was very difficult of administration in the customhouse.

Mr. MANN. The only reclassification is to leave out the words "fancy and perfumed toilet soap," otherwise it is the identical language.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. That was left out on the recommendation of the New York customhouse, because the law as it read was found to be difficult of administration. The perfumed toilet soap was taxed 50 per cent in the Payne law and 40 per cent in ours.

Mr. MANN. And the plain toilet soap was taxed 20 per cent, and in the gentleman's bill is taxed 40 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is very much mistaken. The grade of soap to which he refers will now come in at 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. "Toilet soap, 40 per cent ad valorem." That covers toilet soaps.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes additional time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is, I think, entirely mistaken. "Toilet soaps" means the Roget and Gallet soaps and the Austrian and German high-grade soaps, on which there is a slight reduction in duty.

Mr. MANN. "Toilet soap" does not necessarily mean either fancy or perfumed toilet soap.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It has come to be so construed at the customhouse.

Mr. MANN. It was under the law brought in in that way, and the other soap, if it was not perfumed or fancy, was brought in under a general classification at 20 per cent, and there is a large amount of it used in this country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, we have reduced the rate of taxation upon the ordinary kinds of soap from 20 per cent ad valorem to 15 per cent ad valorem, and we have made the classification which is found in this bill upon the recommendation of the New York customhouse, because they found difficulty in administering the features as they were in the Payne law.

Mr. MANN. I take it they did not recommend a rate of duty.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; but a reclassification.

Mr. MANN. They did not recommend that plain toilet soap be increased from 20 to 40 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Plain soaps instead of being increased are reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent.

As to the effect of this bill upon the other manufacturing industries of the country, the committee report goes very fully into the subject, and I shall not now read to the committee the items entering into other manufactures upon which we have reduced the rates.

Since the second section of the reciprocity agreement with Canada went into effect, about 70 per cent of the print paper and pulp from Canada has entered free, and in view of that fact, this bill, covering many items of immense importance to the paper manufacturing trade, has made very great cuts in duties, all of which I will insert in my remarks and which may be found on page 13 of the committee report.

Mr. MANN. Could the gentleman briefly call our attention to it? I do not like to take the gentleman's time, but I am very much interested in that subject.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Would the gentleman like to have me read it?

Mr. MANN. If it is short.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is not. It is quite a long list, but I shall be very glad to read it. Here are the chemicals entering into paper making. Sulphuric acid is now taxed at a quarter of a cent per pound, and it is put on the free list under this bill. Alum is taxed at one-quarter and three-eighths of a cent per pound, equal to 37 per cent, and the rate under this bill is 15 per cent. Chloride of lime is now taxed at one-half a cent per pound, or 24.81 per cent, and is reduced to one-tenth of a cent per pound, or 12.53 per cent. Glue size is taxed at 25 per cent, and under this bill is reduced to 15 per cent. Blanc-fixe is taxed at 43.07 per cent, and in this bill is reduced to 20 per cent. Chrome colors are taxed under the Payne law at 26.85 per cent, reduced in this bill to 20 per cent. Ochery and ochery earths, under the Payne law, 41.21 per cent, and in this bill reduced to 10 and 20 per cent, according to class. Ultramarine, under the Payne law 32.25 per cent, is reduced in this bill to 20 per cent. Vermillion reds, not containing quicksilver, under the Payne law 19.11 per cent, is raised in this bill to 25 per cent.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this raise is due to the fact that the metal schedule, which just preceded this revision, contains a 25 per cent ad valorem tax on lead, which constitutes the bulk of the material of manufacture of these vermilion reds not containing quicksilver.

Potash bichromate, under the Payne law 30.30 per cent, reduced in this bill to 13.50 per cent. Prussiate of potash, red, in the Payne bill 43.07 per cent, reduced in this bill to 10.75 per cent; yellow, in the Payne bill 39.37 per cent, reduced in this bill to 12.50 per cent. Sal soda, in the Payne bill 23.64 per cent, reduced in this bill to 18 per cent; soda ash, in the Payne bill 22.36 per cent, reduced in this bill to 11.35 per cent; silicate of soda, in the Payne bill 39.53 per cent, reduced in this bill to 13.89 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, that will indicate the tremendous cuts that have been made on the materials of manufacture of the paper-making trade, which are covered in Schedule A.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell us what rate was put on caustic soda—what change was made?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The salts of soda have all been classified under a paragraph headed "sodas," and the salts of potash have all been classified under a paragraph "potash."

Mr. MANN. I say caustic soda. What was done with that?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Caustic soda has been cut from one-half cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent a pound.

Mr. MANN. Caustic soda is on the free list now.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No. The gentleman is thinking about caustic potash and not caustic soda. This is what the paper trade uses.

Mr. Chairman, the same degree of cut in the duties covering the ingredients of manufacture in cotton and wool will be found in this bill, and are covered by pages 14 and 15 of the committee report. Bearing in mind the fact that the Democrats have proposed in other bills to put the woolen manufacturing and the cotton manufacturing industries upon a competitive basis, they have endeavored in this bill to put the materials of manufacture which are covered by Schedule A also on a competitive basis, to the end that the manufacturers may receive these materials cheaper and, through the manufacturers, that the consuming public may benefit by these cuts. The cotton and wool manufacturing industries are the largest consumers of chemicals in this country. In some cotton-finishing mills the cost of chemicals is at least 10 per cent of the cost of production. Here are the important chemicals used by cotton manufacturers, with our reductions in the rates: Acetic acid, from three-fourths cent and 2 cents per pound to the free list; formic acid, from 25 per cent to 23 per cent; oxalic acid, from 2 cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound; tannic acid, from 35 cents per pound to 4 cents per pound; caustic soda, from one-half cent per pound to one-quarter cent per pound; vegetable dyes, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent; logwood extracts, from seven-eighths cent per pound to three-eighths cent per pound; coal-tar dyes, from 30 per cent to 25 per cent, while some of the lower grades are raised.

In the woolen industry immense quantities of chemicals are used, some of which, with their reductions in our bill, are as follows: Acetic acid, from 16 per cent to the free list; oxalic acid, from 38 per cent to 25 per cent; bichromate of potash, 30 per cent to 13 per cent; hyposulphite of soda, three-eighths cent per pound to one-fourth cent per pound; carbonate of soda, one-fourth cent per pound to one-eighth cent per pound; logwood extract, seven-eighths cent per pound to three-eighths cent per pound; coal-tar dyes, from 30 per cent to 25 per cent, with some raises in the lower grades; sulphuric acid, from 18 per cent to the free list; and formic acid, from 25 per cent to 23 per cent.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman turn to paragraph 95, as I find it in the free list in the caucus bill, referring to sheep dip, reading, "sheep dip containing five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of arsenic or more." I want to know of the gentleman if he does not think the word "more" should be the word "less"?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. What page is that?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It is on page 181.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; I think the gentleman misapprehends the purpose of it. The purpose of the proviso containing part is that the sheep dip shall contain at least five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of arsenic.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Precisely; now another question. The reason I was asking the question is because arsenic is on the free list itself, and why should it be confined to five one-hundredths; why should it be any quantity of arsenic in the dip?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, it might be more than five one-hundredths of 1 per cent, but it must be at least that, and the reason for that is this: The custom officials report to us that under the heading of sheep dip, in spite of the clause in the Dingley bill which tried to confine sheep dip to materials only used for sheep dip, under that paragraph a great many other articles which were not intended for sheep dip and could not be used for sheep dip were being imported, so the committee has drafted this paragraph to cover that question.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for making the explanation, because I know he is in sympathy with me in my effort to explain anything that pertains to sheep or wool to my constituents. I want to uphold the hands of the Democrats wherever I can upon that, and here is one grain of comfort—that we are going to get free sheep dip.

Mr. PAYNE. You have had it since we passed the Payne law.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I sympathize more with my good friend from Colorado than I do with the sheep. Mr. Chairman, there is just one other subject I would like to discuss. Certain New York makers of patent medicines of very doubtful value have given to certain newspapers laments to the effect that this bill increases the tax on the sick man.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman not to divert me from my argument on medicines to sheep; I have already explained that—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was not going to discuss sheep.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And I will thank the gentleman not to interrupt me now.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I will not interrupt the gentleman if he desires me not to do so.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Reverting to the question of patent medicines, instead of increasing the tax upon the sick man this bill does the exact opposite, and the burdens upon the users of medicines are immensely alleviated. The animus for the statement that we are increasing the taxes on the sick may be found in the fact that the following bases of patent medicines are taxed which were formerly on the free list: Balsams, crude, are put on the tax list at 10 per cent, while the refined balsams have been reduced in duty; buchu leaves, formerly on the free list, are now taxed at 10 cents a pound, which equals 13 per cent ad valorem, which it is estimated will place a burden of one-third of a cent per day on the maximum dose administered to those persons who are unfortunate enough to make use of this drug; gentian has been transferred from the free list and taxed at 1 cent a pound, which equals 6 per cent ad valorem; ergot has been transferred from the free list to 10 per cent; and coca leaves, which are the raw material for manufacturing cocaine, and which are afterwards used for the manufacture of coca cola, have been raised from 5 cents per pound to 10 cents per pound. All of these are revenue propositions.

We have also raised the rates on the following habit-forming drugs: Caffein, but we have taxed the impure tea leaves out of which it is made; cocaine, but we have raised the tax on coca leaves; and opium, laudanum, and morphine, which have been nearly doubled in duty both for the sake of revenue and on grounds of public policy.

The bill imposes taxes on habit-forming drugs nearly double the taxes of the existing law. For example, opium in the Payne law, which contains 9 per cent or over of morphia, is taxed $1.50 per pound; our bill provides a tax of $3 per pound. Opium, dried, to contain 15 per cent or less of moisture, and so forth, is taxed $2 a pound in the Payne law and $4 per pound in our bill. Morphine is taxed $1.50 per ounce in the Payne law, $3 an ounce in our bill; cocaine, $1.50 an ounce in the Payne law, $2 an ounce in our bill; caffein, at 25 per cent in the Payne law and 75 cents per pound, or 41 per cent ad valorem, in our bill; opium, prepared for smoking, and opium containing less than 9 per cent of morphia, which is also smoking opium, are taxed $6 per pound in the existing law and in our bill, but this rate is a surplussage, because by the act of 1909 the importation of smoking opium into the United States was absolutely prohibited. It is unfortunately true, however, that opium smoking still continues in this country, partly as a result of smuggling and partly because smoking opium is sometimes manufactured out of medicinal opium. It is believed that the new rates of taxation will discourage the latter process.

The campaign against habit-forming drugs is widespread, and opium in particular has been the subject of an international congress recently held at Brussels. The Chinese nation is trying to throw off the habit of smoking opium, and England is at last consenting to reduce the size of her poppy fields in India. The United States must not be behind in this movement. So far as the tariff law is able to reduce the consumption of habit-forming drugs, we have endeavored in the present bill to bring about that end. Many a confirmed user of these drugs attributes his or her downfall to the physician's prescription, and so, although their use in the alleviation of pain is a wonderful blessing to humanity, it seems wise that the law should restrict, as carefully as may be, careless and widespread use of these drugs.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman speaking of opium now?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How will this affect this question at all?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think it will somewhat restrict the use of opium, laudanum, and morphine. As it stands, it is, perhaps, incomplete until we add to it a heavy revenue duty upon the American manufacture of those products, which I for one hope to see come to pass.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe the time will ever come when you can collect $4 a pound on opium?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. They could get it now. It is now worth $8 a pound, and that would not be more than 50 per cent ad valorem tax.

Mr. MANN. Could you collect it?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes. It may always be somewhat smuggled, but increased rates will make people more careful in the use of habit-forming drugs.

Mr. MANN. We had $4 per pound duty on smoking opium before, but at that rate very little came into the country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman is correct. We had to pass legislation to prohibit the importation of smoking opium, and I think the whole subject of habit-forming drugs is not complete until we legislate additionally along the lines I have indicated.

So far as the tariff can have any effect on this matter, I am in favor of raising the duty on them.

Mr. MANN. Are the Treasury officials of the opinion that we will be able to collect a duty of $4 a pound on opium in preference to having it smuggled in?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the official of the customhouse department, whom I questioned upon the subject of an increased tax on opium, did not suggest that the duty could not be collected. And the bill in this completed form has been to the Treasury Department for an opinion, and no suggestion was made by that department that it would be difficult or impossible to collect this tax.

I have spoken about the medicinal articles which have been raised and the reasons why we have raised them.

On the other hand, our bill puts the following on the free list: Antitoxins, serums, and so forth; borax, crude; acetic acid; santolin; refined sulphur; and keeps on the free list all the crude botanical drugs, barks, berries, and so forth, except the two or three above mentioned; and reduces the rate from one-quarter of 1 cent per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem on the refined drugs, barks, berries, and so forth, to 10 per cent ad valorem.

Moreover, the following medicines and medicinal compounds are reduced by the bill:

Medicinal compounds—the basket clause which includes by far the greater number of importations of medicinal compounds—reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent; if containing alcohol, reduced from 64 per cent, 84 per cent, 62 per cent to 30 per cent.

Borax, refined, from 2 cents per pound to one-eighth of 1 cent per pound.

Bromin, 25 per cent to 10 per cent (2 cents per pound).

Calomel and mercurial compounds, 35 per cent to 15 per cent.

Chloroform, from 10 cents a pound to 4 cents a pound.

Collodion, from 22 per cent to 15 per cent.

Ethers, from 40 per cent, 60 per cent, 30 per cent to 20 per cent.

Formaldehyde, from 25 per cent to 4 per cent.

Iodine, resublimed, 20 cents per pound to 15 cents per pound.

Iodate of potash, 25 cents per pound to 20 cents per pound.

Iodoform, 75 cents per pound to 25 cents per pound.

Magnesium, calcined, 7 cents a pound to 3½ cents a pound.

Magnesia (Epsom salts), one-fifth of 1 cent per pound to one-tenth of 1 cent per pound.

Menthol, 25 per cent to 20 per cent.

Cod liver oil, 15 cents a gallon to 12 cents a gallon.

Castor oil, 35 cents a gallon to 20 cents a gallon.

Plasters, 25 per cent to 15 per cent.

Medicinal soaps, 64 per cent to 30 per cent.

Bicarbonate of soda, 20 per cent to 8 per cent.

Sumac, manufactured, three-tenths of 1 cent to one-fifth of 1 cent per pound.

Talcum powder, 34 per cent to 15 per cent.

It will be immediately perceived, Mr. Chairman, that ninety-ninth, or, perhaps, ninety-nine one-hundredths, of medicines and medical compounds have been immensely reduced in duties, and that as to those few articles in which we raised the duties it was done either for revenue purposes or to restrict the use of habit-forming drugs.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I understand an attempt is to be made by Members on the other side of the House to show that this bill, instead of reducing the rates, raises the rates of taxation. That is a matter which perhaps might be left to the American people to decide, because it is only necessary to take in parallel columns the different articles covered by this bill to show how immense have been the reductions in rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question there.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any such table published by the committee?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; it is published by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it included in the report?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; it is in the report.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman tell the page where that can be found?

Mr. MADDEN. Is it in parallel columns?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; it is all in parallel columns. It is printed in the report. It begins on page 28, Appendix A.

Now, simply because we have transferred from the free list certain noncompetitive articles for taxation purposes, as a revenue proposition, articles in which no question of incidental protection is involved, an attempt will be made to show that although these articles so transferred average in rates only 9.71 per cent ad valorem, our bill actually increases the ad valorem average of the schedule. As a matter of fact, it reduces the ad valorem average from 25.72 to 16.66 per cent.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. It will do that, however, by adding about $38,000,000 to the dutiable list from the free list?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes. I stated a number of times in my remarks that we did so, and I have explained the reason why we transferred these articles at a low revenue tax. I do not think it is necessary now to rehearse these things, but gentlemen should not allow themselves to be confused by any argument based upon the fact that we have increased the percentage of dutiable articles. An increase in the percentage of dutiable articles is not the same as an increase of ad valorem taxation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. COOPER. I see on page 23 a comparison of the rates of duty under the act of 1909 with those under the pending bill, together with imports and duties for 1911 and estimates for a corresponding period under the pending bill. If the gentleman will observe the left-hand column, under the classification "Acid, acetic anhydrous"—

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes—

Mr. COOPER. Under the act of 1909 the rate of duty was 2½ cents per pound and the equivalent ad valorem was 13.38 per cent. Then, under this pending bill the same rate is left, 2½ cents a pound, and the equivalent ad valorem rate is stated to be 13.37 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I would not think such a matter as that worthy of the very distinguished attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin. But I will say that in making these calculations the clerks in each case divided the expected revenues by the rate of taxation, and the results do not always figure out with mathematical exactness the same as the actual rates or actual revenues.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but here is the same article, with exactly the same specific rate, and how it can be changed from 13.38 to 13.37, except for the mere purpose of showing a reduction, occurred to me as a question worth asking, and I do not think the gentleman from New York has answered it.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes to invoke questions—

Mr. PALMER. Does not the gentleman understand that the value changes from year to year? It makes all the difference in the world in the ad valorem rate.

Mr. COOPER. But there is a difference of one one-hundredth of 1 per cent made in calculations that are identical.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman can immediately see that it was an independent calculation, made by the clerks of the committee, and their calculation was one one-hundredth of 1 per cent different from the calculation made by the employees of the Bureau of Commerce and Labor. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just made a comparison of the ad valorem under the bill and the ad valorem under existing law, stating, as I understood him, that the ad valorem under the existing law was 25 per cent plus, and under the bill was 16 per cent plus, and hence showed a reduction. But the gentleman, as I understand it, does not contend that if you take all the importations of all the articles named on the dutiable list in this bill and divide that by the duties collected it would make an ad valorem of 25 per cent plus.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I certainly did not make that contention. I freely admit, and have given the reasons for the statement, that we have increased the percentage of dutiable articles, but we have cut 40 per cent out of the average ad valorem rate of taxation.

Mr. MANN. I understand all that, but when the gentleman made his summary he did not say anything about that. His statement was that the average ad valorem under the present law was 25 per cent plus, which would lead anyone to suppose that he meant 25 per cent on the articles included in this dutiable list.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, not at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. What is the average ad valorem, taking the importations of all the articles included in this bill and the duties paid in the last fiscal year?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the average ad valorem of the Payne law on the chemical schedule is 25.72 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Not at all. The gentleman knows that is not correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to yield some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this is the first among the many tariff bills that have been brought into this House by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] since his party assumed control of legislation that I can conscientiously greet with an expression of congratulation. I hasten to say, however, that my congratulations extend only to the technical features of the bill and the manner in which it has been prepared, and not to the basic principles upon which the final conclusions of the Democratic caucus have been reached.

In the first place, this bill was prepared in consultation with experts employed by the Tariff Board. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was based upon a report of the Tariff Board. It is true this report is incomplete and does not deal with the question of the cost of production of any article in this schedule, either at home or abroad, a thing which we on this side of the House regard as essential in the making of scientific tariffs; but, such as it is, it has been adopted by the gentleman from Alabama and his assistants, and constitutes the principal and authoritative part of the report which accompanies this bill.

In the second place, the system of specific duties, always advocated by this side of the House and recommended by every Republican Secretary of the Treasury for more than half a century, has been adopted, and the Democratic theory of ad valorem duties has been absolutely abandoned. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will call gentlemen's attention to the fact that they have even adopted specific duties in this bill which were ad valorem under the Payne law. There is not a duty in this bill which can by any possibility be specific that has not been made specific.

Only a very few months ago a bill was passed in this House revising all the duties in the chemical schedule and making every one of them ad valorem, and it received the unanimous vote of gentlemen on that side of the House. It may seem astonishing to a layman to hear that a great political party has so completely reversed itself on a matter of such great importance as this within the space of only a few months.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit me to continue for a few moments, then I will be glad to yield. To those, however, who have studied the history of the Democratic Party, particularly in tariff legislation, such a complete reversal of attitude only calls for feelings of mild surprise, and because in this case the right-about-face has been forward instead of, as generally, backward, my feelings of surprise give way to expressions of congratulation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have, then, in this bill at least two features for which we on this side of the House have continuously contended—a report of the Tariff Board dealing at least with the history of technicalities of the chemical industry, and in the second place specific duties throughout.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the Tariff Board report deal with the cost of production at home and abroad?

Mr. LONGWORTH. A moment ago I explained that it did not, and so it lacks the essential feature which we on this side of the House deem necessary in the fixing of proper tariffs. In other words, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, I am commending only the methods by which this bill has been prepared and not at all the principles upon which these duties were written or the bill itself.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state whether the committee had any information at all as to the costs upon which it based the schedules in this bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not only did they not have any such information, but they specifically say that they do not require or want such information.

In view of the fact that specific duties are provided and that the bill is based upon the findings, incomplete though they are, of the Tariff Board, we are in a better position than we have been in any bill hitherto brought in to discuss the basic theory upon which this bill is framed, as opposed to the theory upon which we on this side of the House contend that duties in this schedule, as well as in other schedules, ought to be framed.

Schedule A of the tariff would seem to the average citizen a matter not particularly important. He hears usually of the wool, the cotton, and the steel schedules, but little about the chemical schedule, and yet it requires only a glance at the figures in this report to realize what a stupendous industry it is in this country.

On page 304 of the report there is a table giving the figures as applied to chemical industries, the term being used in its broad sense and as applied not only to those industries which manufacture chemicals, but to those who use them as a necessary part of their processes, and all of which are affected by the duties provided in Schedule A.

In 1905 the number of these establishments in this country was more than 56,000. The average number of wage earners was more than 1,100,000. The total wages paid in that year was $575,000,000. The cost of materials used was nearly $3,000,000,000 and the value of the product was over $4,700,000,000. These figures are so huge as to be absolutely incomprehensible to the average human mind. But either because of their incomprehensibility or because of the fact that American industries are not recognized in the Democratic textbook, this schedule was attacked by our friends on the other side not only without a qualm, but with enthusiastic ardor.

The gentleman from Alabama is a busy man. He not only has the party upon the other side of the House on his hands, but he also is busily engaged in keeping another distinguished Democratic leader, who assumes to control the Democratic Party outside of this House, off his toes [laughter]; and so he has been unable to give the personal attention to this schedule which he usually devotes to others. He selected as his amenities, so to speak, a subcommittee consisting of these distinguished tariff experts, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], who has just so learnedly addressed us; the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS]; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL].

The gentleman from New York who, as a matter of fact, has drafted this bill and is prepared to admit it, accepted the trust and embarked upon it pale but confident. [Laughter.] It was observed by his friends that his genial laughter was no longer heard in the corridors and cloakrooms of this Capitol; that his voice was seldom raised on the floor of this House; and that his expressive countenance whenever it was revealed to the light of day was partially masked by a pair of professorial spectacles of the most enormous size. [Laughter.]

And so for some time the mountain labored—labored, indeed, as he has told us, since the 1st of last April—and brought forth not even a mouse. [Laughter on the Republican side.] What to do, whither to turn, became the question that disturbed the appetite of the gentleman from New York by day and his dreams by night. Suddenly the solution flashed upon him, but to the gentleman from New York the solution must have been most grievously embarrassing. What was the only resort left to the gentleman from New York? Nothing else in the world but the Tariff Board and its corps of trained experts. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Think, gentlemen, and think with pity of the sad case of the gentleman from New York under these circumstances. He who had been, in season and out of season, the Tariff Board's most uncompromising opponent, he who was the only Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress to oppose it, he who refused to follow the leadership of the distinguished Speaker of this House and the floor leader upon the Democratic side in their original unqualified indorsement of this Tariff Board. But in this case, as in many others, consistency had to yield to necessity, and so the gentleman from New York directed his steps toward the Treasury Department and to that portion of the Treasury Department occupied by the hated Tariff Board.

It is related that the gentleman from Connecticut walked one day into the offices of the Tariff Board and there he saw the gentleman from New York—think of it, gentlemen—surrounded by piles of data gathered by the board, surrounded by experts employed by the Tariff Board, with spectacles upon nose, drafting the provisions of this bill. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

It is further related that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who, I think most of his colleagues will agree, is usually of robust health, was compelled to call in the services of a physician. [Laughter.] Be that as it may, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] from that time on continued his consultation with the Tariff Board experts, as he will continue his consultations with them until this bill has been passed, and the report that we have before us is the witness of his renunciation of Democratic theory and his adoption of Republican plain common sense. [Applause on the Republican side.] So the discussion of this bill resolves itself, as it ought always to do, and as we on this side of the House have always contended that it should do, into a question of the basic principles upon which these duties are fixed and not upon the methods by which the results were arrived at.

The title of this bill in my judgment ought to be, in contradistinction to the law it seeks to amend, "An act to decrease the free list, to disturb the revenues, and to discourage the industries of the United States." It is a bill frankly and avowedly purposed to take away any protection whatever from the American chemical industry.

I now quote from the report at the top of page 17:

The question of protection—

And this is a sentence the study of which I earnestly recommend to my colleagues on this side of the House—

The question of protection for domestic industries is always raised whenever it is proposed to reduce tariff duties; and it has lately become the practice of some to recommend the adjustment of rates of duty with a view to affording protection equivalent to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. This proposition is theoretically erroneous and practically inapplicable.

Note, gentlemen, there is nothing said about the reasonable profit to the manufacturer. The arguments that we have heard from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as to the insuring of profits are not quoted here. They have got it down to the actual cost of production alone.

I read again:

It has lately become the practice of some to recommend the adjustment of rates of duty with a view to affording protection equivalent to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

This proposition is theoretically erroneous and practically inapplicable.

That statement I commend for its absolute frankness. It leaves no possible loophole by which any gentleman who believes in Republican principles, who stands upon the last Republican platform, can bring himself to support this bill.

No matter how strong may be the desire of some of us upon this side to vote for duties lower than those carried in the present law, in this or any other schedule; no matter how strongly we may believe that many duties are in excess of the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, there is not one of us who would repudiate the Republican platform and vote for duties which are, in fact, and frankly and avowedly intended to be beneath the measure of protection as laid down in that platform.

You say—

the question of protection for domestic industries is always raised when it is proposed to reduce tariff duties.

You are half right. It is raised, and always will be raised, by Republicans whenever you propose to reduce duties below the true protective point; but it will not be raised when we upon this side of the House bring in, as I hope at this session of Congress we will, a bill to reduce the duties in the woolen schedule, because we have had a report from the Tariff Board which shows that those duties can be substantially reduced without driving out of business either the American woolgrower or the American woolen manufacturer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You say—

It has lately become the practice of some to recommend the adjustment of rates of duty with a view to affording protection equivalent to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

Again, this is a half truth. It is not the practice of some. It is the practice of all Republicans, and will continue to be. You say further that this proposition is theoretically erroneous and practically inapplicable. That question we are willing to leave to the American people, and when it is placed before them stripped, as we intend it shall be, of all loose verbiage, and unobscured by misstatements and perversion of the facts, we do not fear but that your "some" will turn out to be millions, and that those millions will constitute the majority of the straight-thinking, patriotic American voters.

You have put this case in a nutshell, and I ask nothing better than that by it you shall be judged. I ask nothing better than that this shall be the dominant issue upon which the two parties shall come before the American people in the next campaign.

I have said that this bill ought to be entitled "An act to discourage American industries." I do not believe that that expression is strong enough. If it should become a law, its effect would be not only to discourage American chemical industries, but also to destroy many of them. At least this is frankly and avowedly its purpose. Our opponents point out that this industry has increased in the past 20 years, but they fail to mention the fact that that growth has come under Republican laws which have given them reasonable protection. Their principle seems to be that when any American industry has grown for that very reason it ought to be discouraged. Hence they proceed in this bill to discourage it in two ways. In the first place by reducing the duties on the finished product, and in the second place by increasing the duties on the products which must be imported to make the finished product. That is the basic principle of this entire bill, and appears in it from the beginning to the end. The ire of the Democratic Party is always particularly aroused against any American who has ever at any time been able to sell any of his products abroad. This is a serious offense in the eyes of the gentleman from Alabama and his competent assistants, and one which calls for immediate measures of penalization. You remember a bill which passed the House a few days ago revising the steel schedule, which placed the finished product of certain American industries—and I am going to call attention to only one of them, the machine-tool industry—on the free list and retained the duties on every product that went into it. Now, I want to show the consistency of some of the members of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee. I want to call attention to a speech made in the last Congress by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] in which he was speaking of the question recently referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], the question of taxing raw materials. During the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia I asked him this question:

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to know whether the logic of the gentleman's position would lead him to say that wherever a tax was placed on the raw material there should always be a tax on the manufactured article?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I should think so, undoubtedly.

Now, I would like to get further information from some of the members of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee. I would be glad if the gentleman from New York would enlighten me as to whether he agrees with the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated this morning that the furthest I would go in support of the doctrine of free raw material is to leave on the free list those raw materials the imposition of a tax on which would increase the cost of the necessities of life, but on articles as carried in this bill, like perfumes and luxuries of that sort, let them be taxed—

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman did not quite apprehend my question. My question is this, that where there is a duty upon the raw material, would the gentleman advocate that the finished article should be placed on the free list?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I should think a properly balanced bill would be drawn with that in view, namely, to tax the finished products when the material of manufacture is taxed, not for the sake of protection but for the sake of collecting a moderate rate of revenue off the higher priced article.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the proposition of the gentleman from New York is that a properly drawn bill ought to place the finished products of American industries, manufactured in competition with those of other nations of the world, on the free list, and place duties or raise duties on all intermediate articles that go into the finished product.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, no; I did not say that; that is not my theory at all; the gentleman from Ohio has some way or other misunderstood my answer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not wish to misquote the gentleman, of course.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If this bill contained any case whatever where the materials manufactured are on the dutiable list and the finished product on the free list I am unaware of it, with the single exception of sulphate of ammonia, which was put on the free list by the Payne committee and which we left on the free list.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes additional to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes additional.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not wish to misquote the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], but it is evident that he disagrees absolutely with the proposition laid down by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY].

On page 5 of this report is a table showing imports and exports of chemicals in this and other competing countries, which, it is said, indicates the greater comparative development of the industry and its competitive power in the United States as compared with other countries. It seems to me that a close examination of this table will reveal facts which absolutely contradict this statement, and I call your attention to it, gentlemen.

In 1897 France imported $22,000,000 worth of chemicals and exported $25,000,000 worth; in 1906 she imported $31,000,000 worth and exported $35,000,000 worth. In other words, France in those periods consistently exported more than she imported by in the neighborhood of 10 per cent.

Now, take Germany. In 1897 Germany imported, in round numbers, $55,000,000 worth of chemicals and exported $78,000,000 worth, and in 1906 she imported $75,000,000 worth and exported $135,000,000 worth. In other words, in 1897 Germany exported more than she imported by about 37 or 38 per cent, and in 1906 she exported more than she imported by more than 80 per cent.

Now, take the United States. In 1897 we imported $45,000,000 worth of chemicals and exported less than $10,000,000 worth. In other words, we imported more than we exported by in the neighborhood of 350 per cent. And in 1906, where we imported $75,000,000 worth and exported $19,000,000 worth, we imported more than we exported by nearly 300 per cent. And upon that showing, gentlemen, the proponents of this bill come into this House and say that our competitive power as compared with other nations of the world has continually increased, while that of all other nations has decreased.

And that in the face of the fact that to-day this country and Germany import almost exactly the same amount in value of chemicals and we export less than one-eighth of what Germany does. They give that as a reason for penalizing American industries, because, forsooth, it has been shown, they say, that we can compete with all other nations of the world and that our competitive power is increasing relatively to those of other nations. It is a pure and sheer absurdity, gentlemen.

From the beginning to the end of this bill you will find, as I have said before, that duties have been increased upon things which are not and can not be produced in this country and lowered it on things which are produced here in competition with nations of the world.

Take the free list which the gentleman from New York has recently explained. Sixteen articles, of the total value of $283,000, dutiable under the present law, have been placed on the free list. On the other hand, about 150 articles are taken from the free list, of a total value of $42,000,000, and duties imposed upon them of somewhere between 5 and 20 per cent. In other words, by this bill the American people will be compelled to pay a tax upon nearly $42,000,000 worth of articles which must be imported because they are not produced here, upon $42,000,000 worth of articles which, under the present law, come in absolutely free of duty. And this is called a reduction of the duties in the interest of the consumer.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Just what is the purpose of that, as explained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]? I did not catch it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from New York says that it is for the purpose of raising the revenue.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Are we in such need of revenue as to resort to that?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably had the various tariff bills brought in by the other side been passed we would be in need of raising $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 of revenue instead of a paltry four million, which this bill purports to raise. I will come later to the discussion of the subject which the gentleman's question suggests.

Now, mark well, gentlemen, that these things which have been removed from the free list are not by any means luxuries in the great majority of cases. They are, on the contrary, necessities used in the everyday life of the average American family. The proposition is that for the purpose of raising revenue—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Right there could the gentleman give an illustration of those necessities?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I call attention to the list as read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], and if the gentleman from Michigan will glance at page 9 of this report and read this list of approximately 100 articles he will find—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is pepper in the list?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Pepper, of course; and all sorts of spices and things that the American workman has on his table at every meal. The list contains coal-tar products of all kinds, which are used in dyeing gingham and calicoes and things of that sort, and they are taxed in this bill at anywhere from 5 to 20 per cent, and that extra cost must be paid by the consumer, because they can not be produced in this country. And so the proposition is that for the purpose of raising revenue the people should be taxed on articles they consume daily, and no corresponding benefits by any possibility go to a single American citizen.

This is the exact opposite of our theory of tariff making. We do not believe that a duty should be laid upon anything which is not produced and can not be produced in this country. In other words, we are not willing that the cost of an imported article should be possibly raised to the American consumer unless thereby an American industry may be established and American workmen may find employment.

Under the theory laid down by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], the theory adopted in this bill, of imposing taxes for revenue purposes upon articles of daily necessity which can not be produced in this country and must be imported, you gentlemen can not avoid, when you come to it, putting a duty on tea and coffee, and I want to be here on the floor when you do it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. You will not be. They will never get a chance to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, they will have to do it if they follow the logic of this bill. There is no escape from it, even by the intellectually gymnastic mind of the gentleman from New York or any of his colleagues. He has imposed a duty in this bill upon spices and many other articles, which must be imported because they can not be produced here, and which are used on the table, three times a day, and in the household of the average American family; and upon that theory he must, in order to raise revenue, impose a duty on tea and coffee.

Mr. DALZELL. Why do they not put a duty on tea and coffee? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I must leave that for them to answer. This proposition is to raise revenue by a tariff on imported necessities. The time, of course, will come—

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman realize that after the elections in November they will not be interested in the subject of revenue? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. They will not be interested in Government revenue.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand, from the gentleman's statement, that in order to be consistent the gentlemen on the other side will be compelled to levy a duty on tea and coffee. But does the gentleman from Ohio expect the gentlemen on the other side to be consistent on anything? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SLOAN. No; that is too much. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would take more time than I have at my command and more speculative ability than I possess to enable me to answer that.

I look forward, Mr. Chairman, with pleasure to the time when, after their peregrinations through the various tariff schedules, they will at length arrive at the agricultural schedule, and by that time the necessity for raising revenues will be, as I said a moment ago, not only pressing but imperative, and it will not be any picayune amount like $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, but it will be somewhere around $80,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Now, what is so easy, what is so simple, as to put a tax of 5 or 6 cents a pound on coffee and a tax of 8 or 10 cents a pound on tea?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Did not the Republican side of the committee, of which the gentleman was a member, agree to impose a tax of 9 cents a pound on tea? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. No, that was merely discussed in committee.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Ohio is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, is he not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. What, if any, opportunity was given to the members of the minority or what part did they take in the drafting of this bill or the fixing of the rates?

Mr. LONGWORTH. We took such time as was comprised between the hour of 11.15 and the hour of 11.45 on the morning of the day this bill was reported to the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Let me suggest that that was after the bill had been adopted by the Democratic caucus.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. I now remember, further replying to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], that the subject of a duty on tea and coffee was discussed in the committee, but the tariff bill, as reported by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, contained no duty upon tea or coffee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Whatever may have been done or discussed two years ago, the gentleman has not answered my question as to what would be an easier and more logical method, under the theory that he has advanced to-day, of raising revenue, say $80,000,000, than by placing a duty of 5 or 6 cents a pound on coffee and a duty of 8 or 10 cents a pound on tea?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman, I could suggest a great many ways of collecting taxes which I think would impose much less burden upon the American people.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. But does the gentleman deny that under the principle adopted in this bill, of taxing spices and various other necessities, it would not be absolutely logical to put a tax on coffee?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, the gentleman may frame his own logic to suit himself. In my judgment spices are not a necessary of life, and I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that although the Republicans taxed red pepper and left white and black pepper to come in free, we cut the duty on red pepper and imposed a duty on white and black pepper, and we also cut the duty on mustard [applause on the Democratic side], which, of course, the people use more than they use black pepper.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman taxed black pepper, which of course is used only by the vulgar rich. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, again referring to the question of tea, it comes back clearly to my mind that during the consideration of the Payne law the only proposition made to impose a tax on tea was an amendment placing a duty of 15 cents a pound upon it, offered by a Senator from a Southern State, on the express ground that under a 15-cent duty tea would become an established industry in his State.

Mr. DALZELL. It was introduced by a Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The only time that it was seriously considered was when it was proposed by a member of the Democratic Party, and for the purposes of protection pure and simple.

I have not the time—and I have trespassed too long already—even if I had the inclination, to discuss the various items of this bill. It is not so much the question of the precise effect that it would have if passed as it is the principle upon which these duties have been fixed. I have no doubt—but it is a mere guess on my part—that some of the duties provided in this bill are in fact protective. On the other hand, I have no doubt that a great many of them are not protective, and would necessarily result in crippling a large part of the American chemical industry.

But that is not the question. If, by any chance, there are duties which are protective, they are there against the express declaration of the framers of this bill that no duty shall be protective. If any such protective duties are left in the bill, they are there by inadvertence and not by intention on the part of its framers. It is primarily and avowedly drafted on the principle of a tariff for revenue only. Its frank and avowed object is to stimulate imports and not to stimulate American industry. I, for one, welcome this bill, and particularly the report that goes with it, as the best exposition so far of the newest Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only. Its proponents have yielded on every point that we upon this side have insisted upon as to the method and manner of framing a tariff bill. They have consulted the Tariff Board and the experts employed by it, and they have made the duties throughout specific instead of ad valorem. The issue framed by this bill and report is as near bedrock as it is possible to make it. It is all summed up in their statement, to which I have referred and which I will again repeat, that the measure of protection as provided in the Republican platform is theoretically erroneous and practically inapplicable. It is no longer, then, a question of an excess of protection that is in issue. It is the principle of protection itself. Upon this issue we shall appeal to the American people, confident of the justice of our cause. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, in the press of the country on yesterday the Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, is quoted as having made the following comment on the report of the special committee to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. and others:

WICKERSHAM GLAD SUGAR TRUST IS "DISCOVERED."

ST. LOUIS, February 17.

Attorney General Wickersham, after reading the report of the Hardwick Committee, laughed heartily and said:

"So Congress has waked up, has it? Congress is slow, as usual. I found out to my own satisfaction seven months ago that there was a Sugar Trust controlling more than 62 per cent of the industry in this country, and filed the Government suit. I am glad to know that Congress, seven months after I took that action, has really discovered that there is a Sugar Trust."

It seems to me that the Attorney General's comment is of at least doubtful propriety, but since it seems that he thought otherwise, I can not, in behalf of the committee and of myself, permit such criticism, from so responsible a source, to go unanswered.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman credit that report?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is published in every paper in the country.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, surely the gentleman does not credit everything he sees reported in the newspapers.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I hope this report is inaccurate, but it has not been denied, and I can see no reason to disbelieve it. The Attorney General insists that "Congress is slow, as usual," intimating, if not expressly stating, that his own department is "fast" and has long known that "there was a Sugar Trust, controlling more than 62 per cent of the industry in this country."

The select committee has run no race with the Attorney General nor anyone else, in an effort to engage in a political chase of one of the great trusts. The inquiry was planned and conducted on far broader lines. It was intended to make a careful and painstaking study of conditions in one of our great industries so that we might have exact and accurate information as to industrial conditions therein, and be prepared to make use of that knowledge when we came to consider amendments and improvements to the laws relating to trusts and monopolies. That the committee has gathered a vast store of such information is the opinion of those who have followed its work most closely, and that its work may prove of value to this House and its legislative committees is the earnest hope and confident belief of those who have participated in its labors.

But to return to the Attorney General. He says he "has known for seven months that there was a Sugar Trust." My friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] expresses the hope that this "interview" was not given out by the Attorney General, and I hope so, too, but I have reason to believe it was. I would not have made the statement if it had not been published in almost every paper in the country.

Mr. MANN. It is an Associated Press dispatch.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Attorney General will disavow it, then. I ask why this alert and able law officer of the Government has taken no steps to punish on the criminal side of the court the men who maintain and operate that trust in violation of the law? Surely he has not forgotten that the Sherman law carries penal provisions as well as civil remedies. Nor can the Attorney General contend that the one prosecution that has been brought, the case of the United States against Kissell and others, is sufficiently broad in its scope to discharge the Government's duty in this regard. That case, now pending in the United States court of the southern district of New York, involves but one of many attempts to stifle competition, and while the men who are alleged to have participated in that transaction—the acquisition of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Co.—are under indictment, yet there are at least 20 other instances, according to allegations made by the Attorney General himself in the civil suit filed by him against the American Sugar Refining Co., in which the criminal provisions of the Sherman law have been violated and in which there have been absolutely no prosecutions. And yet in each of these cases the statute of limitations does not protect the men who have violated the law, because, under the principle decided in the Kissell case (18 U. S., 601), these transactions were all part of one continuous conspiracy to monopolize interstate trade.

More than that, this same law officer, who boasts that he has known there was a Sugar Trust long before the report of the committee was made, makes absolutely no effort to enforce that provision of the law which says:

Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Until our Attorney General accelerates the pace with which he moves to the discharge of his own duty in this regard I submit that it would be well for him to refrain from criticism of Congress as "slow." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HARRISON of New York and Mr. DALZELL to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, under the liberal rules of discussion prevailing in debates upon the tariff laws, I shall not confine myself to the schedule under consideration, but shall devote the time allotted to me by the gentleman from Alabama to a kindred subject, which but for a point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] would now be before the House for consideration, in the resolution reported this morning by the Rules Committee through its chairman.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution referred to, reported by the efficient chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. HENRY of Texas] and concurred in, as I presume, by all the majority members of that committee, meets my hearty approval and shall have my earnest support.

This resolution, no doubt, is the result of the action of the Democratic caucus recently held in this Hall for the purpose of taking into consideration measures to be adopted for the control, if they be subject to control by law, of the gigantic money power and its evil combinations existing in this country. In the caucus of the Democratic Members before referred to, while there may have been some difference of opinion as to detail, there was none, or at least none manifested, upon the main question of the necessity for such remedial legislation as may come within the jurisdiction of Congress to control the evils which were upon that occasion by the gentleman from Texas so forcibly pointed out and brought to the attention of the caucus. If the gentleman from Texas failed to get everything in detail as advocated by him upon that occasion, he certainly can congratulate himself, and the minority who followed him, upon the fact that his main object at that time was fully and completely accomplished, and that his Democratic colleagues in Congress were fully convinced that a situation as to financial matters exists in this country which, like the blood of Abel, cries aloud to Heaven. Since Waterloo, the Rothschilds have controlled the money affairs of Europe; since Appomattox, Wall Street has held with firm hand the financial reins of this country, and it has been but a few months since the only ex-President of this Nation has testified before a committee of this body that in the year 1907 he was compelled to agree to a violation of the law before the money kings would consent to the alleviation of a panic.

The matter of detail to which I have referred was chiefly as to the manner of procedure to obtain the legislation which the country so badly needs, and which the citizenship thereof is so loudly and forcibly demanding. Some of the members of the caucus thought that better results could be obtained through the operation of a special committee appointed for the purpose of investigation, while others, constituting a majority of the membership, thought the regular manner of procedure through the committees of the House, which have full power, not only to investigate all questions which might arise, but also the additional power, not possessed by a special committee, of reporting legislation. That is to say, the majority believed that not only is investigation needed, but that the greater need was something tangible, substantial, and effective in the way of law.

With this majority I, together with the other Democratic Members from my State, after due consultation, concurred. That this difference in detail and manner of procedure should not only be magnified, but also misrepresented by those who were opposed to the remedial legislation contemplated, was perhaps to be expected. Because it may be easily seen that if it should be believed throughout the country that the majority membership of the House of Representatives were seriously divided upon the main proposition involved, it would to a large extent impair the prospects for the demanded legislation and have the natural effect to render the enactment of salutary laws improbable. But there are many who, sincerely desiring the enactment of such laws as would be of practical benefit in the situation confronting us—laws to control the evil and punish, if need be, the evildoers—and who are in nowise open to the criticism of being enemies to the legislation, were of the opinion that the special committee afforded the best manner of procedure. Many of these have long studied this problem with assiduity and patience, and their views upon the subject are entitled to the worthiest consideration; and for them and for the minority members of the caucus for their advice and judgment I have the highest esteem and can not fail upon this present opportunity to express the same. I desire to say further that in my opinion no member of the caucus referred to had any other desire or design in his heart than that of serving in the most effectual manner, as light was given him to see the pathway, the interests of his constituents and the necessities of the Nation. And I believe that I may safely predict that in the vote which shall be taken on the pending resolution there will be shown the practically unanimous desire of the Democratic membership of this House to advance the cause of the common people by the passage of such legislation as will, to as large extent as possible, remedy the evils of which they so justly make complaint.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there can be no serious question that the plan proposed by the caucus and embodied in the resolution, by which it virtually becomes the mandate of this House that the Committee on Banking and Currency, composed of some of the ablest men of the House, on both sides of the dividing aisle, shall not only investigate and obtain information, but shall report measures to be enacted into law, is better and more efficient than a mere investigation by a select committee of this body having no power of legislation. Under the rules of the House there is no provision whereby a select committee, however able its membership may be, or however lofty may be their ideals of right and wrong, or their willingness to enforce the right against the wrong, can report a bill for passage with such effect as that which accompanies the report of a standing committee of the House.

However arduous may be the work of a select committee, however deep its investigations and examinations, and they can be no deeper than those of a standing committee, after all has been done by it, the result of its labors must be referred to some regular committee to be again investigated by it before legislation can ensue. I again repeat what I have before stated in substance, that legislation rather than investigation is what is needed. It is not necessary for this House to learn by a long and extended investigation that a great and growing evil is in existence here, in consequence of which the comparatively few very rich men of the country are allowed to feed upon the labors and the products of the great masses of the ordinary, common people, who compose the bone and sinew of the Nation and the creators of its wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I do not decry such investigation and examination as will enable the committee of this body to ascertain and report upon such matters as require relief, and which may be necessary in the preparation of their bills, but, on the contrary, I think it imperative that the committee and its subcommittees shall make a full and thorough investigation of all things necessary to this end; and I feel assured that this committee will spare no pains in obtaining such knowledge as will enable them to prepare and report for passage a measure of relief which in all respects will respond to the necessities of the times and the vigorous demands of all who are seeking this relief.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the report of a special committee to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co., which was filed in this House on Saturday last by its chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. Here is a committee composed of men as able as any in this House. The resolution under which they acted was adopted on the 9th of May, 1911, nine months ago. This committee has worked hard and faithfully, and their report shows information most valuable to this House and to the country. Yet if these men had constituted a standing committee, rather than a select one, their information would not have been the less valuable and important, and all which they report might have been done by a standing committee with equal, and, in fact, better, results to the House. The standing committee could have reported, in addition, a measure of relief. I desire to read the concluding clause of that report, as follows:

As this matter belongs to the jurisdiction of a great standing committee of the House, your special committee will not, as a committee, undertake to present a bill upon the subject or to further elaborate the idea herein suggested, being confident that the entire subject matter will receive careful and prompt consideration by the standing committee having jurisdiction thereof.

You will therefore see, Mr. Chairman, that this able select committee of the House of Representatives, after long and arduous toil, are at the end forced to come into this House and recommend a reference of the subject matter of their inquiry to the standing committee, which alone has power to report a measure of relief.

It is a striking evidence that the majority of the caucus were wise in the adoption of the resolution under consideration rather than one, however otherwise meritorious, which would postpone indefinitely the contemplated legislation.

It has been claimed by some that the action of the caucus in amending—and not defeating as has been energetically circulated throughout the country—the original Henry resolution was intended as a reflection against the views of the most prominent Democrat in this country, and who likewise stands among the ablest living statesmen of the world; who has thrice led his party in national campaigns which, though not resulting in the election of the candidate, have resulted in the engrafting upon the policy and the legislation of this Government such principles tending for the benefit of man that the contemplation thereof necessarily calls with it the personality of him who was their author and most eminent expounder.

Mr. Chairman, this country has produced three men the coincidences in whose lives are so striking as to indicate that they are not the result of chance but of something higher than the will of man. Each of them has been thrice defeated for the highest office within the gift of the people. Two of them upon three occasions by the people at large, and the other twice in the conventions of his party and once by the electors at the polls. One of these men, Henry Clay, was the leading man in his country's history during the first half of the nineteenth century, and he has been described as the leading English-speaking statesman of his period. Another, James G. Blaine, led the advance guards of his party when it had supreme control, from the close of the Civil War to the latter decade of the nineteenth century, and his voice was powerful and potent in forming the constructive policies of the Nation. The third, William Jennings Bryan, has for 15 years or more formulated the policies and the leading principles of the great militant Democratic Party and still is its acknowledged leader. Not only is this true, but there is indissolubly connected with his great name many principles of right and justice which have been engrafted upon the public policy of the country by the assistance of the very men who defeated him for office while they were opposing such principles. Clay was a Whig, Blaine a Republican, and Bryan a Democrat. So that the three great parties who have at different times controlled the destiny of the Nation are each represented in the illustrious trio. We are told that the joint lives of three great patriarchs, Adam, Methuselah, and Noah, made a continuous line from the creation of the world to its destruction by the Deluge, and that they carried down in their memories until the time that letters were discovered the antediluvian traditions and histories of our planet.

As a parallel to this I point out the fact that Henry Clay was born 12 years before the adoption of the American Constitution. He died in June, 1852, 22 years after the birth of James G. Blaine, in 1830. Mr. Blaine died in January, 1893, when William Jennings Bryan, born in 1860, was 33 years old. Bryan still lives, and it is the hope of every good citizen of this land that he may long continue in his upright and useful career. It will appear that the joint lives of these three men extends from a period antedating the formation of this Government by 12 years down to the present day, and these three illustrious men could have easily handed down by word of mouth, without change of verbiage, the Constitution of the country, though it had never been reduced to writing. No man reviles the memory of Henry Clay or casts reproach upon the brilliant genius of James G. Blaine, and the time will come when the third parallel, William Jennings Bryan, upon the consideration of the great deeds which he has accomplished for the benefit of man, will be spoken of only in the highest terms of praise and honor.

Mr. Chairman, as an humble member of the Democratic caucus I repel the charge and insinuation that that caucus has ever at any time taken a single action based upon disrespect to Mr. Bryan. I deplore the declarations sometimes made from quarters least to be expected that there are animosities between the Great Commoner and the leaders of this House. Slight differences have been magnified and grossly exaggerated for the sole purpose, I believe, of creating contention within the Democratic ranks. Differences in mere details have been contorted into representations of difference in substance. Small things upon which all men may reasonably differ have been construed as essentials, and, so far as I have seen, no one has referred to the unity existing as to great matters of substance, as to which we all, without exception, follow the leadership of Bryan.

O ye scribblers for the information of the public. Why have ye not told us of some of the matters upon which Bryan and UNDERWOOD and CLARK and HENRY and others of this House are in full accord? Why have ye confined yourselves to the trifles upon which they, or some of them, appear to differ? For years Bryan has advocated a modification of the rules of the House, whereby the representatives of the people could be given greater power and force; and when this Congress was assembled in special session in April last the first important action of the House was to carry this great idea into effect, and there the stentorian voice of OSCAR UNDERWOOD blended in perfect harmony with the silver tongue of ROBERT HENRY in the adoption of this measure. Bryan has long contended that the people of the States were entitled to a direct vote upon the election of their Senators, and under the leadership of UNDERWOOD and his able friend from Missouri, the chairman of the proper committee, this measure has long since passed this House. Bryan for years has urged the admission of two new States into this Union. This has been accomplished with UNDERWOOD as the leader, and on the 4th of next July two new stars will be added to our flag in significance of the fact that all the continental territory of this Nation is now embraced in free and equal States. Bryan has advocated that full publicity should be given before the election to all contributions and expenditures by candidates for either branch of Congress. UNDERWOOD and his followers have enacted it into law. Bryan has long demanded that the taxes oppressing the American people for the benefit of a few citizens should be reduced and, if possible, done away with.

The House, with UNDERWOOD at its head, has hastened to afford relief in this respect, and the success would have been complete except for the adverse action of the President, who has confessed that his vetoes are based upon his lack of knowledge in the premises. Do these things show discord and indicate a rupture of the Democratic Party? If these things have been accomplished with alleged lukewarmness between the leaders, what would be the bounds of the good results if they should engage in active hostile combat with each other? Like Mark Twain's pilot, "If they have accomplished all this while merely sleeping, what could not they do if they were dead?"

Our friends on the other side of the aisle, no doubt, would much enjoy the situation if these alleged dissensions among Democratic ranks were truly in existence; but it is not our place to help them out. They have a brave and valorous leader in the person of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and he is always alert and vigilant. He only eats on Sundays, and I verily believe never sleeps at all. If he had been a marshal under Napoleon at Waterloo, the battle might have resulted differently, because he would have discovered the absence of Grouchy at the proper time and suggested the absence of a quorum; and, if necessary, he would have halted the oncoming hosts of Wellington by a well-interposed demand for the yeas and nays. He needs no help from our side of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

And what of the other gentleman from Illinois, the ex-Speaker of this House? Who can doubt his ability? With 40 years of service here he stands with eye undimmed like the leader of the Hebrews searching for, but not discovering, the Promised Land. [Laughter.] Upon the slightest occasion which may arise he scents the battle from afar and is at his post to do what he conceives to be his warlike duty, and I predict that it will not be many hours before his voice is heard upon the iniquity of this House in imposing upon the farmer a tax of perhaps 2 cents a year on pepper. Do not let these Carthaginian Hannibals sow dissension in our Roman camps, nor allow these English Pitts to divide the forces of this fair France of ours. The masses of the people of this land can spare from their ramparts no BRYAN, CLARK, UNDERWOOD, JAMES, or HENRY, nor any other brave and valiant leader. We need them all. Long have these able men whom I have named stood at the outposts of Democracy and endeavored to guard the interests of the common people. If the light is now breaking and the clouds dispersing before the rising sun of just and salutary legislation, let us not bedim the scene by strife among ourselves when with united front we should face the energetic and powerful army in our opposition. Our cause is for the righteous masses of the people, and to them is our responsibility and for them is our hope.

Toll, Time and circumstance, full oft,
An humble cause has raised aloft.
And Fortune whom she scorned before,
Has placed on solid ground once more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has 1 hour and 40 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has 2 hours and 37 minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have just witnessed an occurrence in the House which if it had taken place some months ago would have been considered remarkable. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON] has delivered on the floor of the House a brilliant encomium on the life, character, and public services of the Peerless Leader without the sign of applause on the Democratic side of the House. [Laughter.] Whether the gentleman from West Virginia intentionally delivered his remarks in a low tone of voice so that they could not be heard on the Democratic side I do not know, but since I have been a Member of the House it has usually been impossible for any gentleman on the Democratic side to whisper the name of Mr. Bryan without vociferous applause until at this time, when, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], time has been given to praise the gentleman from Nebraska, the gentleman from Alabama in full confidence that the praise would not receive approval on the Democratic side of the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman inform me whether or not, within his knowledge, the gentleman from West Virginia is a member of the "Tell-me-how-to-vote Club"?

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if it was within the gentleman's knowledge if the gentleman from West Virginia was a member of the "Tell-me-how-to-vote Club."

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. The Democratic caucus, does the gentleman mean?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no, no. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we again approach the consideration of a tariff bill affecting the industries the annual production of which amounts to a billion and a half dollars in our own country. And while we are forced to the consideration of this bill before we have had an opportunity of examining the report of the committee, and hence from our side coming to it with some difficulty, I desire to call the attention of the House to a few of the provisions in the pending bill.

I note with some pleasure that in the framing of this bill the Democratic side of the House has adopted a suggestion which I made to them on the floor when the wool bill was up for consideration—that they provide for an amendment in the existing tariff law so as to leave applicable to their new bill those provisions in the law relating to the maximum and minimum tariff and those provisions in the law relating to reciprocity with Cuba.

When the bill was before the House the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] derided the maximum and minimum provisions of the law and the Cuban reciprocity law when I offered an amendment to perfect the bill at that time. But now, learning from this side of the House some things in regard to the framing of a bill, they themselves propose to make the pending bill a part of the existing tariff law so as to leave these other provisions applicable to the provisions of this bill.

But I notice with some degree of chagrin that in the framing of this bill the gentlemen who framed it had not examined the law which they proposed to amend. The bill provides in paragraph 1 that it shall be a substitute for paragraphs 1 to 83, inclusive, of section 1 of the Payne tariff law, and of section 25 of section 2982 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 1 of the Payne law.

It is strange to me that it did not strike the attention of the gentlemen who drew the bill to see a provision in a bill amending section 25 of section some other number, when it has been the invariable practice in all the laws to not number different sections under another section.

Now, what is the fact? A bill proposing that this bill shall be a substitute in place of section 25 of section 2982 of the Revised Statutes when there is no such section. That would be subject of chagrin if offered from this side of the House, but I think nothing will embarrass the gentlemen on that side of the House. There is no section 25 of section 2982 of the Revised Statutes. It is not a great matter, but it is a great illustration of the carelessness or the care with which the gentlemen framed this bill.

Section 2982 of the Revised Statutes is a short section in the Revised Statutes five lines long. It was amended by the Payne tariff law in a section seven lines long, and that is all there is to section 2982 of the Revised Statutes in the Payne law—one section; and yet they propose to substitute this bill in place of section 25 of that section; and there is no section 2 of the section, much less is there a section 25.

Now, I am very glad to yield time out of my time to any gentleman on that side of the House or on this who can discover in the statutes of the United States anywhere section 25 of section 2982 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 21 of the Payne tariff law, as is provided in this bill.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] can not explain it. There is no explanation except absolute lack of knowledge—where a man drawing a bill to take the place of a law never examines the law to see what it is. Mr. Chairman, this provision was in the caucus print where I first noticed it. I supposed, of course, that some gentleman would discover it and eliminate that provision from the bill. When the bill was introduced, I noticed it in the bill as introduced, after the caucus had passed upon it, and when it was reported I still saw the provision in the bill which any clerk in my room would have known enough to strike out. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the gentleman ought to go easy in criticizing the caucus, because I understand the bill was passed in the caucus without reading. They did not read it in the caucus.

Mr. MANN. Why, the bill was passed in the caucus without reading, and it was passed in the Ways and Means Committee without reading. It was never read by any member of the Committee on Ways and Means except the gentleman who prepared it—the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]—and doubtless he did not read this provision, for, if he did, it is incomprehensible how he could have missed what I am now calling to the attention of the House.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the bill been read in the House yet?

Mr. MANN. It has not been read in the House, and very little opportunity will be given probably to consider it in the House. We are called upon to take up the bill before we have had a chance to examine the report, and the expectation on that side of the House is that they will drive it through to-morrow; that we will have to stay here to-night to finish debate, and to-morrow night, possibly all night, to pass a bill on the ground that we have to give a chance to the appropriation bills. Under the new rules of this House the appropriation bills are consuming time, with the insatiate desire of gentlemen on that side of the House to talk.

Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated to the House that he had given information concerning this bill to the Associated Press, in the nature of an interview, and that therefore the House had information upon the subject. In that interview as reported by the Associated Press and sent to all of the newspapers in the country occurs this statement:

Principally the measure increases duties on perfumes, fancy soaps, and other luxuries, and lowers the duty on drugs and materials in common use.

I do not know whether the gentleman from Alabama said anything which could be construed into that statement, but I am quite sure that neither the gentleman from Alabama nor any other gentleman could have made the statement, because in no part of it is it true.

The bill does not purport to increase the duties on perfumes, fancy soaps, and other luxuries, and it does not purport to lower the duty on drugs. Quite the contrary. In the consideration of this bill I think it is fair to the House to call attention to a map in connection with page 312 of the report. Anyone who examines that map can understand the bill without further consideration. The map gives the location of the industries affected by this bill, by States, placing a black spherical mark in the different States, the mark differing in size in proportion to the industries located in the different States.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Just a moment. It will be noticed that some small periods constitute the black marks for the Southern States, the representatives of which control the tariff legislation on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. And you will see large black marks in the States of the North where the industries are located. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In which State does the gentleman find the largest black mark indicating the most chemical industries?

Mr. MANN. In the State of New York, which the gentleman from New York misrepresents on tariff legislation. The southern Representatives have such strong control of that side of the House that they have even forced the gentleman from New York to endeavor to strike down the industries of his own State. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Is the gentleman aware that the subcommittee's report on this bill was—and I think I am betraying no confidence in so saying—chiefly drafted by myself and accepted by the full committee with practically no change, and that no southern member of the committee had, therefore, any substantial share in fixing the rates in this bill?

Mr. MANN. I go further than the gentleman. I just stated to the House that the Democratic caucus and the Democratic Ways and Means Committee agreed to the gentleman's report without anybody on that side of the House reading it.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman has not made a fair deduction from my answer.

Mr. MANN. I am not through yet.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. They paid the closest attention to the report of the subcommittee, and so did the caucus.

Mr. MANN. They did it without reading, and I have been here long enough as a Member of this House to understand the ways and intricacies of legislation. I know the influences that are brought to bear upon Members in drafting legislation before the legislation is presented, and the gentleman from New York, weakly or foolishly yielding to the demands of the representatives from these States which have no industries affected, has been compelled to bring in a bill which strikes down these industries of his own State. That is not to his credit. Now, Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that we might have reasonable debate upon this bill. I had hoped that I might be able to analyze the bill in many of its paragraphs, but I am not able to do that for lack of time. Taking as a sample, however, one of the first paragraphs in the bill, I want to call attention to what the bill does, not only in that paragraph but throughout the bill. Take paragraph nine:

Argols or crude tartar or wine lees, crude or partly refined, containing not more than 90 per cent of potassium bitartrate, 10 per cent ad valorem, etc.; cream of tartar, 2½ cents per pound.

This item is a fair sample of what the bill does. It increases the duty on the raw material 100 per cent, and reduces the duty on the manufactured product 50 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Is the gentleman aware, so far as baking powder, into which these articles go, is concerned, that our bill reduces the rate on alum from 37 per cent to 15 per cent and on bicarbonate of soda from three-quarters to one-quarter of a cent per pound?

Mr. MANN. I would much rather have had the gentleman give us that information in his own speech, which he cut short for lack of time.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will permit I would like to ask the gentleman from New York to give us the name of the baking powder that contains alum.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Most of them do.

Mr. MANN. There are plenty of them.

Mr. COOPER. The best of them do not.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is the proposition. We imported last year crude tartar to the extent of over 29,000,000 pounds at 5 per cent ad valorem. We did not import very much cream of tartar refined, although we imported some—we imported 23,000 pounds. They propose to double the tariff on the crude material, of which we imported 29,000,000 pounds, and reduce the tariff on the refined article, and what will be the result? The gentleman says that our putting part of the paper coming from Canada on the free list has been a great blow to the paper industry. Crude tartar comes in the main from southern Europe, from wine casks, and it is not a manufactured article at all, but is an incident of the production of wine. We import it and manufacture it here into cream of tartar, which is used in our baking powders. They propose that this crude tartar shall be manufactured in Europe and brought in here as the finished cream of tartar. Is that to the benefit of the country; is that to the benefit of the industries of our country? Will that furnish any labor here in the refining of the crude tartar? Is it better for us to employ the labor here in refining this article or to permit it to be refined by the cheap labor of southern Europe?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. For a question.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman is no doubt aware of the fact that there is substantially no labor involved in the refining of argols, and even if there were—

Mr. MANN. I heard the gentleman's statement on the subject.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And even if there were, is not the gentleman aware that the ad valorem rate rises with the value of the product and presents the same resistance to importations of the finished article proportionately that it does on the raw material?

Mr. MANN. You increase the ad valorem rate or its equivalent on crude tartar from 5 to 10 per cent and decrease the rate on the finished product from 35 per cent to 17½ per cent.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. You may imagine that you can keep the business here by cutting off both ends, but anyone of common sense knows that you can not do it, and if your bill becomes a law the industry, which is now a flourishing industry in the United States, will be transferred from this country to Europe. You are legislating in behalf of the people of Europe; we prefer to legislate in behalf of the people of our own country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to do so, but I have a few observations which I wish to make.

Mr. HARDY. All right.

Mr. MANN. What more do you do in this bill? You take dead and creosote oil, the consumption of which has vastly increased in the United States for the preservation of railway ties and other classes of wood, and of which we imported last year $2,384,000 worth, while they were on the free list, and put the tariff on them. Is that to the interest of the people of the country? You take a noncompetitive article from the free list and put it upon the dutiable list in order to prevent the consumption of that article in the preservation of the woods of the country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will realize I have very little time.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman is very courteous in yielding, but surely he remembers that the Payne law placed the duty on creosote oil, and it was stricken from the dutiable list and put on the free list by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The intention of the law was to tax it 20 per cent. We put a 5 per cent tax on it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's statement is absolutely incorrect. The Payne law puts this article upon the free list, and the gentleman can find it. There is a provision of law covering it in the free list. A Treasury decision decided a certain class of this oil belonged under that provision of the law. I went over the matter myself with the Treasury officials on the subject, and while they and we were trying to add to the preservation of the wood of the country by admitting this creosote oil free, you are putting a tariff on it in order to destroy the wood of the country and prevent its preservation.

We imported last year 5,765,000 pounds of gum arabic, used every day by the people of our country of all classes—a non-competitive article. We admit that article free of duty; you put a tariff on it of one-half of 1 cent a pound. Is that in the interests of the people? Is that Democratic tariff policy?

We imported last year of gum demar 12,187,000 pounds, used in the manufacture of varnish in the country. We admit it free of duty. You put a tariff on it of 1 cent a pound.

We imported last year Government copal to the extent of 10,916,000 pounds, used in the manufacture of varnish—and varnish goes into the daily life of every citizen of the country—and we admitted it free of duty, while you put a tax of one-half of 1 cent a pound upon it.

We imported last year 15,497,000 pounds of gum shellac, used constantly in the manufacture of varnishes and certain kinds of paints. We admitted it free of duty; you put a tax on it of 13 cents per pound.

We imported that great luxury, crude camphor, last year to the extent of 3,726,000 pounds. It is my recipe for a cold, though it did not work this time very well. It goes into the daily life of every citizen of the country, and it is a non-competitive article. We admit it free of duty, and you put a tax on it of 3 cents a pound. Is that for the interests of the people? Is that Democratic tariff policy?

We imported last year crude indigo to the extent of $1,152,000 worth. Indigo is the basis for the bluing for the wash women of the land. We admit it free of duty. You tax the wash women 10 per cent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. We imported last year 210,000 pounds of iodine, the very basis of much of the antiseptic surgery of the land. We admitted it free of duty; you put a tax on it of 10 cents a pound.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MANN. For a question. I do not yield for information; I yield for a question.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman is aware that we reduced the rate on iodine resublimed, iodoform, and on potassium iodate.

Mr. MANN. I am aware of the fact that where a thing is manufactured in this country from a foreign crude article you raise the tariff on the crude article and reduce the tariff on the finished product, in order to transfer the industry to other countries, if that is any satisfaction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We imported last year 126,140,000 pounds of crude licorice—not very important to me, as I am neither a boy nor a tobacco consumer. It does not come into competition with anything in this country. We admitted it free of duty. You put a duty of fifteen one-hundredths of a cent tax on each pound of it.

We imported last year 23,193,000 pounds of unground black and white pepper. What a strange inconsistency the gentleman must explain in his bill! Cayenne pepper is the pepper for the rich. That is the luxury article. You find very little of it on the tables of the poor, but black pepper is found on every poor man's table in this wide land. We admitted the black pepper free and put a tax upon the cayenne pepper. You put a tax upon the black pepper and decreased the tax on the luxury, the cayenne pepper. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It may be possible that in getting at these duties what is technically termed a "wheel" was used, and the little ball in this case fell into the "black" instead of the "red." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am inclined to think in this case the same care was used which was attempted on another occasion to provide section 25 in another bill under a supposed "section 2892," there being no such section. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. It looks to me like a dictograph. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we imported last year nearly 5,840,000 gallons of Chinese nut oil, a necessary article in the manufacture of varnishes in this country, of great importance in the State of my distinguished friend from Indiana who is facing me. We admitted it free of duty, it being noncompetitive. You put a tax on it of 5 cents for each gallon.

We imported last year over 51,000,000 pounds of unrefined coconut oil, of great value in many directions in the country. It is the basis of much of the soap of the land. We admitted it free of duty. You put a tax on it of one-quarter of a cent a pound.

We imported last year nearly 6,000,000 pounds of palm oil, useful for the same purpose. We admitted it free of duty. You tax it one-quarter of a cent a pound.

We imported last year over 41,000,000 pounds of soya-bean oil, used for manifold purposes—a practically noncompetitive article. We admitted it free of duty. You tax it a quarter of a cent a pound.

We imported last year 1,140,000 pounds of crude vanilla beans. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] had consulted his "better half," he would have discovered that it was not easy in this country to run a household without vanilla extract. We admit the vanilla beans free of duty. You tax them 50 cents a pound. Is that in the interest of the poor people that you cry aloud about in the country? We admitted these articles free of duty to the extent of over $40,000,000 worth, which you put upon the dutiable list in your bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know what is meant by "we" when you say "We put certain articles on the free list." Do you include yourself and do you refer to the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Did you not vote against that bill? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I did not. The gentleman's lack of information leads him to ask a question. I suppose he has often heard that stated. I voted for the Payne bill when it passed the House. The gentleman had better refresh his recollection from some of his colleagues.

Mr. DALZELL. His colleagues all applauded him.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know if you did not vote against the Payne bill when it passed the House?

Mr. MANN. I did not. I voted for the Payne bill when it passed the House. Come again when you get more information. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Did you not vote against the Payne-Aldrich bill when it came back from the Senate? Did you not do that because wood pulp was not on the free list?

Mr. MANN. I voted "nay" on the conference report. Nobody in the House except my colleague from Illinois was ignorant of the circumstances under which I voted in that case, I am glad to inform the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that we have peanut oil on the free list, but my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. HARRISON], who makes up this tariff bill by himself, as he indicates, without considering his friends in the South, took a rare way of showing his appreciation of them and his own industries by striking down the industries of his own State and giving protection to the peanut oil of the South. Peanut oil! Peanut politics! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] A high tax is put upon peanut oil.

Mr. Chairman, time does not permit me to examine other features of the bill, because we are cut off from the reasonable consideration of this bill, so important to the industries of the country, by the threat on that side of the House to stop even the limited debate which has now been allowed.

I want to say that the people of this country are waking up to the condition of affairs. A year ago on that side of the aisle they were pointing to what they called insurrection and divisions on this side of the aisle. We are nearer together over here than we have been for years, and you are nearer to being split apart than you have been for years. [Applause on the Republican side.] We will go into a campaign united on these great issues affecting the industries of the country. You can not call off William Jennings Bryan.

Mr. SIMS. We are not trying to.

Mr. MANN. We will endeavor in the campaign to make the country understand the meaning of Democratic tariff revision, which is to tax the articles that come in for the benefit of the poor and to transfer our industries to foreign countries. I wish I had time to take up the provisions of the drug paragraph in this bill. We are to-day admitting the crude drugs free of duty. Through an amendment which you slip in under a paragraph purporting to retain these drugs upon the free list, you practically put them all upon the dutiable list. The gentleman shakes his head. I will tell him. It is as plain as the nose on a man's face. Under existing law drugs, barks, beans, berries, and other such things in a crude state are admitted free of duty when not advanced in value or condition by process or treatment beyond that essential to the proper packing of the drugs and the prevention of decay or deterioration pending manufacture. The existing law permits those articles to be packed or preserved in such a way that they may be brought into this country for manufacture into the finished product. You have inserted a provision into the bill which destroys it as a free-list proposition. You say:

When not advanced in value or condition by peeling, shredding, grinding, chipping, crushing.

And so forth.

You can not bring any of them into the country unless they have been prepared in one of these ways. How would you bring in barks without peeling? Do you expect us to import from South America the entire log in order to get the bark of quinine or other substance? Yet under the terms of this bill if they do those things which are necessary in order to bring the crude material into our country, the article is placed upon the dutiable list, expressly in one paragraph of the bill, and indirectly in the paragraph relating to the free list.

Mr. Chairman, your side may come before the country with its false pretenses, but we will tear your false pretenses off your face, confident that the country which has grown in prosperity for the last 50 years is now unwilling to reverse that policy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the most interesting speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to assure him that if the Republican Party does not dodge the tariff issue in the coming campaign the Democratic Party most assuredly is not going to dodge it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is an issue we are willing to meet, and we will meet it with the same confidence that we have met it in the past; for whenever the fight was made straight out upon the tariff question, then it always was that victory perched upon the banners of Democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And as it seems to be generally believed and well understood that in next November the American people, having become dissatisfied with the present administration of affairs, will turn the regulation of these matters over to the Democratic Party, I shall take advantage of this opportunity to briefly review some tariff legislation along the lines just spoken of by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. But at the very beginning of my remarks I want to enter my protest, a protest that I have been wanting for years to enter, against the misuse that gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber have made of the word "protection." How such a word should have become attached to so unjust, unfair, and unequal a system of taxation can be explained only on the theory that, as some men have adopted a cloak of virtue to cover and protect their hypocrisy, so, too, has a great political party, hiding behind an honest word, perpetrated in the name of protection the robbery of a majority of the American people for the benefit of a few. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Protection against what? Protecting a system of taxation which makes it possible, by law, for one man "to get without earning what another man earns without getting"; protecting the tariff-swollen industries from all honest competition and insuring their owner against loss; protecting the Steel Trust, with its immense annual dividend of nearly $140,000,000, against the farmer who needs a plow or the mechanic who needs a saw; protecting the Lumber Trust, which now owns nearly all the standing timber in the United States, against those who would build a schoolhouse for their children, a home for their families, and a church for their God.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would we not have had free lumber if it had not been for 39 Democrats when we were voting on the Payne bill?

Mr. COLLIER. If it had not been for 150 Republicans voting on the other side, we would have had free lumber and a lot of other free things.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I only wanted to call attention to the consistency of the gentleman; go on.

Mr. COLLIER. Democratic consistency is all right, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan—and I lay special stress on Michigan when we talk about lumber—that the dawn of that day is now breaking when the American people, the home builders, will have an opportunity to build a home for their families without being plundered under a tariff that increases the price of every material that goes into their homes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the history of protection in the United States is a long story of hypocrisy and deceit. It has justified its guilty existence by many plausible and seductive arguments. Founded upon selfishness and expediency, it has never failed to abandon a position when it no longer served its purpose in deceiving the people.

Like hunted creatures driven by the advocates of honest government from one position to another, forsaking citadel after citadel, the protectionists have continued to intrench themselves behind the ramparts of special legislation, and for nearly 50 years have been able to fasten their dishonest system of taxation upon the country. At first the protectionist was not the bold creature with the voracious appetite that he has to-day. He was a timid, humble individual begging for a small subsidy for the encouragement of an infant industry which could not alone withstand the competition from abroad. It was contended that a moderate tax would not only place our industries on an equality with foreign manufacturers, but would also tend to the creation of establishing new manufactures, and that when our manufacturers, by reason of this encouragement, would be able to cope on equal terms with the foreign manufacturer, that instead of restricting competition this tariff would create competition. So the tariff of abominations was enacted into law. It took the people about 20 years to become sick and tired of protection.

They began to murmur at being taxed to continue to build up an infant which had assumed so gigantic a proportion. They demanded the repeal of protection; they were willing only to tax themselves sufficient to raise funds necessary to carry on the actual expenses of the Government. The heavy protective taxes were repealed and the country prospered as never before under a purely revenue tariff. The protectionist became thoroughly alarmed. The old argument of encouraging an infant industry had lost all its force, and if it had not been for the great war debt which confronted the country protection would have met a natural death at that time. Here was again the protectionists' opportunity. They therefore abandoned their position of the encouragement of infant industries and clamored for a home market for Americans, and at the same time contended with subtle argument and ingenious fallacy that no part of this tax would be paid by the American people, but that every cent of it would be paid by the foreigner.

This apparently senseless argument would never have been accepted by the American people but for the peculiar condition of affairs then prevailing in the United States. The fires of sectional strife were still smoldering, and whenever the people began to complain at being so heavily taxed the protectionists cunningly distracted their attention by artful appeals to prejudice and passion. In order to fasten his unholy tax upon the backs of the American people he was willing to fan those still-smoking embers of civil strife into a ruddy blaze of sectional hatred, and for a time succeeded. But new generations were coming on and the crimson colors of the bloody shirt began to fade before the pure light of reason, good will, and common sense. People began to realize that the burden of these taxes was falling upon them. They had seen all legitimate competition disappear. They had seen a complete monopoly established on all articles of consumption and manufacture. They had seen these infants develop into gigantic trusts, and they had come to the conclusion that it was themselves and not the foreigners who were paying for these evils. The protectionists, realizing this, saw at once that unless another reason could be shown for the continuation of protection the whole system would crumble and fall to the ground. They, therefore, abandoned their former position for which they had so vigorously contended. They admitted they were wrong; they admitted that the American consumer and not the foreigner paid this tax, but that these taxes were necessary to insure living wages to the workman. They contended in their platforms and on the stump that a high tariff was necessary for the protection of American labor. The cost of living was increased, the price of necessary articles was raised, and everything that the workman ate and wore was placed almost above his reach, so that his wages could be increased and there would be a profit to the manufacturer.

And now, after over 50 years of trial, when the doctrine of protection has proved to be an absolute failure, when it has again become hateful to the American people, and the whole system is tottering and seems to be upon the verge of destruction, the protectionists, making their last stand, have in their desperation abandoned and repudiated all their former positions, and turning another political somersault now present to the American people a new and startling proposition. For 50 years by prohibitive, remorseless, and blighting taxation the Republican Party has drained the resources of the American people and has destroyed all legitimate and honest competition. They have, with the aid of the Government itself through the operation of law, created a system of spoliation which has made it possible for seven great trusts to absolutely destroy and completely control over sixteen hundred distinct and original plants; they have made it possible for 450 lesser trusts, with a combined capital of over $8,000,000,000, to buy up, merge, control, and put out of business over 5,000 distinct and original plants, representing practically every line of productive industry in the United States. They have wrung and extorted from the pockets of the American people countless millions of dollars to give to their favorites. They have abandoned and repudiated every position they have ever occupied. They have been driven from the ramparts of protection. They have been forced out of every intrenchment of special privilege; and now, presenting a wretched and forlorn appearance, the protectionist, like a fox dodging the hounds, twisting and squirming here and there and everywhere, has at last been driven from the thickets and brambles of inconsistency out into the open, where the quarry is in full view, and there seems to be no possibility for escape.

But the protectionists are not yet devoid of resource and cunning. Seeing the grasp of governmental affairs leaving their hands apparently forever, and having exhausted every plausible reason and excuse for a continuation of the present system of taxation, they are again in desperate straits. This system has proven too profitable to them to surrender it without a struggle, and knowing the attitude of the public toward them, their plan now is to delay, to gain time. Therefore they admit that all their past tariff legislation, covering a period of over 50 years, was hasty and without consideration, and we are asked to wait until we can be informed by a Tariff Board of experts how to proceed.

Mr. Chairman, have you ever noticed that when there is a desperate case in court, one in which the defendant is almost sure to be convicted, he is always asking for a continuance? He wants the case delayed; he wants to gain time; and so it is with our friends on the other side of the Chamber. The power to levy these taxes has been taken from them. An outraged public is demanding honest revision. The people are demanding a reduction in these prohibitive rates, and the protectionists' plan now is to obstruct, to delay, to gain time, for every day that honest tariff revision is delayed brings increased wealth to those manufacturing industries it was designed to benefit; every day that we delay honest tariff revision adds to the dividends and increases the profits of those manufacturing industries, and that is one of the reasons why we are asked to delay and wait until we can hear from this board of experts. As long as they were piling taxes mountain high they needed no experts.

They were experts enough and had sufficient tariff knowledge to pile these burdens upon the backs of the people, but now when they are estopped from further tariff legislation and we are given the task of taking these burdens off the backs of the American people we are told that no one in either branch of Congress has sufficient tariff knowledge and sufficient tariff information to attempt this revision until we can hear from this wonderful board. Why, we were told during the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill that printed lists showing the difference in the cost of production here and abroad were sent to the various consuls of the United States, that hundreds of agents from the Bureau of Manufactures and the Department of Commerce and Labor had been sent everywhere commerce touches civilization in quest of information to enable the committee intelligently to draft a bill, and we were told by the then chairman and other members of the Ways and Means Committee, with tiresome and frequent monotony, that the committee was in possession of each and every fact necessary to enable them intelligently to draft a bill. Now, when they have repudiated and abandoned everything that they have said and done in former years and make this astonishing change of front I ask you, Mr. Chairman, what avenues of investigation, what channels of information are now open to this new creation, the Tariff Board, that were closed to all the consuls, and to all the agents and representatives from the Bureau of Manufactures and the Department of Commerce and Labor? What avenues of information are open to this board that were closed to all these duly authorized agents of the Government traveling all over the world, backed by the credit and standing of the United States itself?

I tell you that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], and others on that side of the Chamber, may lay the flattering unction of a presidential veto to their souls as much as their hearts desire, but I say that the President succeeded in deceiving few by his vetoes of last summer. He not only insulted the intelligence of the membership of this House and the memory of the great protection leaders of the past, but he attempted to impose upon the indulgence and credulity of the American people when he stated that no tariff legislation was proper until we could hear from this wonderful board. He underestimated the intelligence of those people who remembered that it was his voice which proclaimed in clarion tones that the Payne-Aldrich bill was the best tariff law ever enacted. What a change of front he presents to the American people. Elected on a platform which declared for an honest tariff revision, he signed a bill that raised the Dingley rates. Holding in one hand a copy of his Winona speech denouncing the woolen schedule as indefensible and in the other a veto of an honest revision of those prohibitive rates, this chief obstructionist, standing between the great mass of the American people and that relief from confiscating taxation which he and his party so glibly promised and so strictly denied, he would further procrastinate an honest revision and gain another continuance for the policies of his party by insisting that we wait an indefinite time on each schedule until this board of experts tells when and where and how to begin this revision. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The whole system of protection is founded upon misrule, misgovernment, and deception. Its advocates have violated nearly every plank in their platform. They deceived the people when they told them this tariff was only intended to encourage an infant industry. They deceived the people when they told them that it was intended to create and establish new manufactories. They deceived the people when they told them that this tax was levied in the interest of competition. They deceived the people when they told them that the foreigner alone paid this tax. They deceived the workingmen with the promise of higher wages. They deceived the people who trusted them with the promise of an honest tariff revision. In all their wretched, guilty life they have been true only to the protected interests which have kept them in power. With their eyes fixed upon privilege and special favoritism as guiding stars it has been their united and determined effort, somehow, somehow, and all the time, to plunge their greedy hands up to the armpits into the pockets of the American people and rob them of the fruits of their labor and their toll, and convert them to the use and benefit of their tariff-swollen beneficiaries. They have been true only to their sacred promise to guarantee a profit to American manufacturers. All the people of the United States must be taxed so that the Steel Trust can make its dividends of $140,000,000. All the people of the United States must be taxed so that the Sugar Trust can charge 2 cents bonus on every pound of sugar that is consumed.

All the people of the United States must be taxed so the Woolen Trust can wring its tribute, while millions of the thinly clad shiver before the chilling blasts of a terrible winter. And every trust and manufacturing establishment, no matter how stupendous its operations, no matter how gigantic its capital and profitable its business, no matter how opulent its wealth and varied its resources, was guaranteed a profit and insured against loss by the Government itself, and the only premium such insurance had to bear was a campaign contribution to the "Grand Old Party." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is said that Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe were protectionists. There is nothing further from the fact. There never was a tariff bill up to 1820 which carried with it a rate of over 20 per cent. There was no idea of protection in the minds of anyone at that time, and most assuredly not that protection which guarantees profits to manufacturers. That tax was levied solely in the interests of competition—that very competition which the protectionists to-day are seeking to destroy. We had very few manufacturing industries in those days, and there was a hope that a moderate tariff would not only stimulate trade and excite competition, but also it might tend toward the creation of additional industries. It was not until the tariff of 1828, the tariff of abominations, with its rate of 41 per cent, became a law, that protection became a fixed policy in the United States. Even then in less than four years the people became so incensed that some of these abominations had to be taken off, which was done by the "Great Compromiser," Henry Clay, himself.

In about 18 years the people became sick and tired of all kinds of protection. These industries were able to stand alone, and the people declared that they would no longer burden themselves with unjust taxes for the benefit of industries which were able to stand by themselves. So the Walker tariff, with its rate of 24 per cent, became a law. So general was the prosperity of the country, so flourishing was the condition of all kinds of commercial and industrial business, under the Walker tariff, that in 1857 the rates of the Walker tariff were still further reduced to 20 per cent; and I want to tell my Republican brethren that the only 10 years in the history of our Government when the country's wealth increased 100 per cent was during the 10 years of the Walker tariff bill, when the Democracy was in control. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So satisfied were the people with a revenue tariff, and so far had the people removed themselves from the idea of a protective tariff, that in 1858 Senator Clement Clay, of Alabama, in a speech in the Senate, stated, without a single protest, that "the doctrine of protection is exploded and is without a party in the country or an advocate in Congress."

Then the war came on. The expenses of that period were enormous, and when peace was declared an empty Treasury and an immense debt confronted Congress. Large sums of money had to be raised. A number of different kinds of war taxes were adopted. An income tax was placed upon the statute book. An unconstitutional tax on cotton was passed. Revenue stamps were placed upon legal and commercial documents, and the tariff rates were raised.

So hateful was the idea of protection in the minds of the American people, and so hateful was this idea of returning to protection in the minds of our people, that Senator Sherman practically denied that these rates were levied for the purpose of protecting a single industry, but that they were levied for the purpose of raising revenue as a war measure.

But the appetite of the voracious protectionist, sharpened by these benefits, was not to be appeased, and the McKinley bill, carrying a rate of nearly 50 per cent, marked the first epoch in American history in which there was a complete surrender to the interests of protection.

The Dingley bill followed with practically the same rate, and then, with all its disastrous consequences to Republican hopes and to Republican ambitions, followed the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, with the highest rate ever passed by an American Congress.

The Republican idea of a tax is that it is a benefit, a subsidy, a bounty to be bestowed, a privilege to be conferred, while the Democratic idea of a tax, and the one taught by the universities and the colleges of every civilized land and the one given by the dictionaries, is that a tax is a burden, an expense to be levied and imposed solely for the purpose of raising sufficient revenue to carry on the expenses of the Government. The Republican, regarding this tax as a benefit and a privilege, gives little heed to revenue. To him protection is the object, revenue is the incident, while the Democratic theory is to levy this tax solely for the purpose of raising revenue sufficient to run the expenses of the Government, and any protection which may follow the tax on an article, the like of which is manufactured in this country, is, of course, incidental. There are only two problems which confront the framer of a Democratic tariff bill. This difference in the cost of production of an article here and abroad has no concern in a Democratic bill. There are only two problems which confront us. First, how much money is necessary to be raised to absolutely defray the expenses of the Government, and then, second, how can we best raise this money in a way which is least burdensome to the American people.

In the State of Mississippi the tax levy to raise funds for the counties' expenses is made by a board of five supervisors who are elected by the people. The compensation of the tax collector depends upon a percentage of the amount of taxes which he collects.

If the tax levy of my county is 12 mills, based upon an assessed valuation of $10,000,000, then, of course, the tax collector would collect more taxes and his compensation would be greater than if the tax levy on this $10,000,000 of valuation were only 10 mills. Suppose Richard Roe was elected a member of this board, and the tax collector was a friend of his who had materially contributed to his election. Suppose he agreed with my Republican friends that a tax is a benefit, and that the taxing powers should be used as a medium by which to distribute and bestow benefits to favored individuals.

In that case, according to the Republican theory of taxation, instead of looking after the interests of the county, instead of looking after the interests of the people who elected him to represent them on that board, and instead of levying this rate as low as was consistent with the actual needs of the county's expenses, he would either disregard these matters entirely or else would regard them as merely incidental, and he would base his vote solely with the end in view of increasing the compensation of his friend who had helped him, the tax collector. A tax levy of 12 mills might be sufficient to meet the expenses of the county government, but a tax levy of 15 mills would increase the compensation of his friend. It is true that in order so to increase the compensation of his friend, the collector, he would have to levy an additional and an unnecessary tax of 3 mills on every taxable citizen of my county. But that would be merely an incident to the transaction because the compensation of his friend would be his first object. Is there one on either side of the Chamber who would not denounce him as a faithless and unworthy servant, false and untrue to the interests of his county and of the people who elected him to represent them on that board?

The Democratic conception of an honest supervisor would be for him to first find out how much money was needed to carry on the expenses of the county government and then to base his vote solely on the amount necessary to raise that fund. The Republican tariff framer cares nothing about the expenses of the Government when he levies a tax. The Republican Party cares nothing about the interests of the people when it levies a tax. The Republican protectionist cares nothing about raising the price of necessities which the great army of consumers are compelled to buy. He cares nothing about increasing the cost of living to everybody. He cares nothing about these matters. They are to him purely incidental. The protectionist is voting to increase the compensation of his friends, the manufacturing industries, and he votes to levy this rate regardless of whether this tax may be prohibitive or not, regardless of whether it will produce revenue or not, but simply to reward them; and if any revenue should be derived from these rates it is merely an incident to the transaction.

I was very much amused and interested the other day in listening to the cheerful and hopeful and optimistic member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], whom I do not see in his seat at present. He was in the House a short time ago, and I am sorry he is not here now. He is one of those cheerful and hopeful gentlemen who see a silver lining to every cloud and encouragement in every disaster, and the repeated and continued and inexcusable blunders of the grand old party cause him no dismay but rather serve to inspire his soul with fond hopes and bright anticipations of continued and future Republican success. He is not only hopeful and cheerful and optimistic, but he is courageous as well. He is as brave as any African lion that, with flashing eyes and lashing tail and threatening, bristling mane, dared to confront Terrible Teddy himself in his triumphant march through the jungles of the Dark Continent; because the gentleman from Connecticut, alone of all the Members on that side, in spite of the storm and protest of disapproval created and aroused by the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill, had the courage to declare upon this floor that this bill was a great march forward in the path of progress. I can but applaud the gentleman for his temerity, for, except him whose name is coupled with that celebrated measure, there are none so poor to do it reverence.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] appears alone in the political arena, the sole knight to take up a lance in its defense; but I fear that his valor is exhibited at the expense of his judgment, for it seems to me that now, in the light of events following the passage of that bill, praise for the Payne-Aldrich law would be like the spectacle of the prince of darkness advocating eternal light. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Though the bravery of the gentleman is conspicuous, yet even his indomitable courage could not prevent his adding that along this path of progress there were a few mudholes on the journey, mudholes which the nimble and active gentleman from Connecticut, with a political hop, skip, and jump, managed to get over in 1910, but which so many of his less favored and less fortunate colleagues who were treading that path of progress found to be not mudholes only, but bogs and mires of direst defeat. The gentleman from Connecticut told us in his first speech—I believe he has made two this session—that unless he is greatly mistaken the American people will in next November elect a Republican House, a Republican Senate, and a Republican President. I am sorry he is not here, so I could ask him upon what he bases his hope. What has happened since the November election of 1910 to indicate a change in sentiment? Does he gain inspiration from the returns from the second district of rock-ribbed Republican Kansas, which for the first time in 16 years has sent a Democrat to Congress? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Does he gain inspiration from the returns from the seventh district of Kansas, which for the first time in its history has sent a Democrat to Washington? Do those returns inspire his soul with confidence and fill his heart with hope? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In view of the general feeling of distrust against Republican misrule and Republican control, in view of the crushing defeat that was administered to that party in the November election of 1910, and in view of the bitter fight raging over the division of spoils wrung from a helpless and betrayed people now going on in the Republican ranks, I tell you, my Democratic brethren, that the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] proves that he is possessed with a mental equilibrium which is absolutely superior either to the dictates of judgment or the reverses of fortune. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I suppose this chemical bill will meet the same fate that was met by those of last summer, and will fall beneath the ax of a Presidential veto. Those on the other side of this Chamber have tauntingly asserted that we have not the power to write a single law upon the statute books; that the Senate can withhold its approval, and that the President can veto. This may be true, but thank God it will not be true for long. As you gentlemen have said, we may only be playing the overture now, but in next November the curtain will rise and the real play will then begin. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, on that day, long looked forward to by all true sons of Democracy, the voice of an outraged people will be heard throughout the land, and the countenances of those who have broken their faith and betrayed their promises will change, and their knees will smite one against the other, as did those of the Assyrian tyrant when, in the banquet halls of Babylon, written in letters of living fire by a mysterious and avenging hand, Belshazzar read the verdict, "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi yielded back the balance of his time. How much time is now remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and one minute.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. How much time is remaining on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and fifty-two minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will use some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I know of nothing that shows more clearly the need of adequate and reliable information upon which to base a revision of the tariff than some of the provisions contained in paragraph 50 of the bill now under consideration. I refer more particularly to the provisions in regard to the tariff on olive oil.

It so chances that in my district, and in the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, are contained extensive olive orchards and extensive manufactures of olive oil. With my limited understanding it is impossible for me to comprehend upon what theory or upon what plan gentlemen on the other side of the House upon the Ways and Means Committee proceeded in formulating the schedule relating to olive oil.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman care to yield to me now for the information?

Mr. HAYES. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I can not frame it in the shape of a question, but the reason the committee had in mind was, admitting that it will reduce the revenues, that it will reduce the cost of living, because olive oil is the poor man's food and his butter, and for the people from the Mediterranean who inhabit the seaport towns it is too great a burden on the consumer at the present rate that the law now carries.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, my experience is different from that of the gentleman from New York. My experience is that the higher grades of olive oil, the tariff upon which is reduced in this bill, are not by any means the poor man's food. They are exclusively and distinctively luxuries. The poor grades of olive oil are not affected so much in this bill as the better grades. Oils contained in quart and gallon receptacles or in small packages are the finer grades of olive oil and are the ones to which I principally refer, and which chiefly make up not only the imports of olive oil but constitute the larger portion of the manufactured oil in this country.

Now, the bill reduces the rate on olive oil intended for food from 50 cents a gallon to 30 cents, and, as the gentleman has said, this could not be a change in the interest of revenue, because it is admitted in the report of the committee that there will be a loss of probably $550,000 revenue as a result of the reduction. Now, as I have pointed out, it could not properly be considered as reducing the cost of food to the poor, because the poor do not consume these higher grades of olive oil.

There is another consideration which does not appeal to the gentleman from New York, and probably not to any man on the Ways and Means Committee on the majority side of the House, and that is that this reduction of 20 cents a gallon of the duty on olive oil will be sufficient to destroy, or at least seriously cripple, a very important and rapidly growing industry in the United States.

Olive oil, as a large commercial commodity, was not produced in California until after the passage of the Dingley bill. It was produced in a small way but not to anything like the extent that it has been produced since then. Large orchards, of hundreds of acres, are scattered all over the State of California, and more are being planted. We are engaged there in an honest industry; because it is a fact, as gentlemen on the other side probably know, that the only strictly pure olive oil that can be bought anywhere in the United States is manufactured in my State. The olive oils that are imported from abroad, I think without exception, as I am advised by the pure-food experts of the Department of Agriculture and by merchants engaged in the importation of these oils, are diluted at least one-half with cottonseed oil. It is almost impossible to detect a blend of olive oil with cottonseed oil where not more than one-half of it is cottonseed oil. I am advised that at least one-half of every bit of the oil imported into this country as olive oil is cottonseed oil that has been sent over from this country to France, Italy, and Spain and there blended with olive oil, shipped back into this country, and sold as strictly pure olive oil in competition with the industry that we are trying to build up and carry on in an honest way in California. Some of it is very much more than half cottonseed oil.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the people of California are not objecting to the passage of this law only or solely because it affects disastrously one of the large interests of that State. We are objecting to it on general principles. We would have objected to it the same if the olive industry was being carried on by the people in the State of the gentleman who is managing this bill on the floor on the other side. We object to it on principle. We recognize when legislation strikes down an industry in the State of New York and takes away the means of livelihood of citizens in that State that the State of California is affected to the same extent, or nearly to the same extent, as is the State of New York.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the lesson which this country received in the not distant past in our history would be sufficient to make it unnecessary to have it repeated, at least during my lifetime. I had hoped that it was sufficiently demonstrated in the years 1893-1897 that it is better for all the people of the United States that the products consumed in the United States should be, as far as possible, manufactured and grown upon the farms and in the orchards and in the mills and factories of the United States instead of money being sent across the water to purchase the products of the labor of Europe or Asia. Everyone who has thought at all deeply upon this subject must have recognized and concluded that the capacity for consumption of the people of the United States, although very large, is, nevertheless, limited, and that every dollar's worth of products made by foreign hands that could have been made by labor in the United States, when purchased by our people, means that some American laborer must stand idle while that dollar's worth of product is being consumed. To the extent that that laborer is displaced by the foreign laborer he will be in enforced idleness.

If these products are purchased in sufficient amounts it means that thousands, even millions, of the working people of the United States will be walking the streets and getting their sustenance from soup houses and public charity, as they did during the continuance of the last Democratic free-trade tariff, or tariff for revenue only, as the Democrats choose to call it. Such a tariff makes it for the interest of our people to buy cheap foreign goods, and thus bring idleness to our laborers and stagnation to our industries. Nothing seems more certain nor clearer to me than this.

Our friends on the other side urge that these laborers who will be turned out of the employments to which they are accustomed will, of necessity, drift into others that will be more profitable to the Nation if not to themselves. Gentlemen on the other side shut their eyes to world facts that any student of this subject ought to know. Among these is the following: There are no such industries that can be developed here rapidly. If such were possible it takes time, and what are our laborers to do in the meantime? We have no way of getting foreign markets abroad, because every commercial country in the world capable of buying our products is on a protective basis to-day excepting one. So the result of their policy will be to give away the home markets for the products of our labor and get nothing in return.

In 1892 the same siren voice that we hear calling to-day to the ultimate consumer was calling to him, urging him to strike down protection in order that he might buy his goods cheaper. That siren voice was heard up on Lake Superior, where I was at that time engaged very actively in business. The ultimate consumer listened then to that voice, and even in that country for the first and only time in its history every precinct went Democratic. After the election this ultimate consumer awoke from the dream into which the siren voice had lulled him and found that he was not primarily the ultimate consumer at all but the producer, and that he had dealt himself a cruel blow. I was at that time engaged as manager of two large producing Lake Superior iron ore mines in the Lake Superior district. I had under me 1,200 men. I thought then that I was too busy to engage in practical politics or to think much about the contest that was being waged in that year.

I might say, incidentally, that I had plenty of time for four or five years after that to engage in politics or any other light occupation that I chose to follow. I awoke the morning after the election to read with amazement and consternation that the people of the United States had been fooled by the Democratic promises and had elected a Democratic President and a Congress Democratic in both branches, pledged to destroy the protective policy and to inaugurate the Democratic policy of tariff for revenue only. Within two weeks after the election we began to feel a lessening in industrial activity and a tightening in the money situation. I was in a position, by reason of my business connections, to know something about the business conditions existing in the country. If they were not healthy and normal, then I was not able to discover it. The country was then passing through one of the greatest periods of prosperity that up to that time it had ever enjoyed, and yet by the time Cleveland was inaugurated, in March, 1893, we were well upon the road to the panic and the industrial depression that characterized the years from 1893 to 1897, because every business man in the United States was retrenching, was getting ready for the great change in the tariff policy of the country that had been promised and that he saw was coming.

In 1893, after the inauguration, you will remember that things went from bad to worse, and our Democratic friends said that the trouble was that the provision of the law requiring the Government to buy 4,000,000 ounces of silver had destroyed the confidence of the people in our currency, and that that law must be repealed and then everything would right itself. Cleveland called the Congress in extraordinary session in 1893 and forced through a repeal of the Sherman purchasing law. I have no fault to find with him for that, but after that was repealed no change in the industrial situation took place. In December, 1893, Congress met in regular session and proceeded at once to revise the tariff, resulting later in the session in the passage of the Wilson bill.

It was thought that with the removal of the uncertainties in regard to the tariff improvement would come in the industrial situation. In spite of that, things got worse. I know; I was in a position to know and to appreciate it. And there was no permanent or essential improvement in the industrial situation until, in 1896, McKinley was elected President and the Congress met in special session and revised the tariff and passed the Dingley bill; and even then there was no improvement for several months, until the country was able to consume the products of foreign labor which were rushed in here in great floods in anticipation of the going into effect of the Dingley bill. And, when that time came, do you not all remember how the mills and the factories began to open, how the soup houses closed up for want of customers, how the sparks went flying once more merrily up the chimneys which had been so long idle, how the boards came off the windows of factories and mills that had been nailed up for five years, and contentment and prosperity and activity and the hum of industry once more filled the land? Oh, I remember all this well, and if I should live for a thousand years I could not forget.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. What is the tariff on olive oil under the present bill? I mean olive oil that is used for the table?

Mr. HAYES. Fifty cents a gallon.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. How much under this?

Mr. HAYES. Thirty cents—reduced from 33½ per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Is there any report of the Tariff Board?

Mr. HAYES. There is none; at least I know of none.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. And no report from the expert of the Tariff Board?

Mr. HAYES. I know of none. I have no source of information, so far as this bill is concerned, except the report of the committee.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman any idea as to what the cost of producing olive oil in this country is?

Mr. HAYES. Well, I can not give the gentleman that information. I have written for it, but I have not received it as yet.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman know what it sells for at wholesale?

Mr. HAYES. It sells for about $1.50 a gallon; that is, for the pure oil.

Mr. MANN. In that connection, if the gentleman will yield—

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say what the present tariff is on denatured olive oil—if that is the proper term—for use for manufacturing purposes which does not come in competition with the California oil?

Mr. HAYES. My information is that it is on the free list. Am I correct?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know what it is under this bill?

Mr. HAYES. Three-eighths of a cent per pound, exemplifying again the principle that the gentleman from Illinois called attention to a little while ago.

I beg the indulgence of the committee for a few moments to recur to a little personal experience of mine in connection with the operation of those iron mines. As I stated, in 1892 I was the manager of two iron mines in the Lake Superior district. In an ordinary year the product of the iron mines is sold during the winter and before the opening of lake navigation. In 1893, although there had been no change in the tariff, the threatened change unsettled the conditions of business and there was no demand for our product. We were not able to sell any iron ore prior to the opening of navigation. We had employed on the location and in the city of Ironwood, Mich., a large number of men, most of them with families. We did not know what would become of those men and their families should we shut the mines down, and so we continued to run through the spring, the summer, and the fall—

Mr. BOWMAN. Without any orders?

Mr. HAYES. Without any orders. In 1893 we had $100,000 in the treasury of one of the companies. We spent that in mining iron ore and piling it on the stock piles when there was no demand or sale for it. We borrowed money after that was exhausted, and continued to pile up the iron ore, because we did not know what else to do. We knew that if the mines were closed the men who had been accustomed to receive employment there would be in destitute circumstances. We went through 1893. We continued to borrow money as long as we could, but in January, 1894, the time came when you could not borrow money if you had United States bonds to offer as security, and we were obliged to shut down those mines and discharge the men, and we did not have time enough nor money enough to pay the expenses for pulling the pumps out of the mines, but had to let the water come in and cover them.

In a few short months after those mines had been shut down the men were in penury and want. The poor, ignorant fellows, not knowing what was the cause of it, marched through the streets of Ironwood, with banners bearing inscriptions like this: "Give us work or bread." They did not know that their former employers were engaged in hustling for bread for their own wives and children—that was my situation, at least, for I did not always know where the next week's provisions were to come from. I ought to say that the city of Ironwood did the best it could to supply them with the necessities of life. After the treasury was empty they issued bonds and tried to sell them in order to get money for that purpose, but the bonds could not be sold at any price. And so these ignorant miners, thinking that the mine owners had shut the mines down intentionally and selfishly to wait for a better day, threatened, unless they were given work, to destroy the machinery and the equipment of the mines; attempting to carry these threats into execution nearly a score of them were shot down by the troops that were sent up there to quell the riots.

The time came when the money that we had borrowed had to be paid, and the men to whom we owed that money shipped the iron ore, which we had produced on the borrowed money, down to Lake Erie ports and sold it, in many cases, for not enough to pay the transportation charges. I am not finding any fault with those creditors. They did the best they could under conditions as they existed then, but the result was that it left us with all the debts on our hands, and they had taken the assets that had been produced by the money which we had obligated ourselves to pay. My brother and I, owning a majority of the stock in those companies, had obligated ourselves, as well as the companies, for this money, and as a result of the disastrous conditions we had to give up our homes and every dollar we possessed in the world in an effort to discharge our obligations. And that was the condition which remained until 1897, as I have said, after the election of McKinley and the passage of the Dingley bill, and the little time that elapsed to allow for the consumption of foreign products that had come into the country to be consumed; then our industries started up. Through the aid of a friend my brother and I secured the possession of our property again, and I had the satisfaction of opening those iron mines, of giving employment again to my men, and once more seeing on their faces and around their homes the evidences of contentment, happiness, and prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.] I had the satisfaction of increasing their wages twice in the year 1900, and very substantially, without their asking for it, because the companies could afford it.

After having had this experience, Mr. Chairman, do you think that I could ever forget the lesson of 1893 to 1897? Never! And when our friends over there talk about the "robber tariff" and all that kind of thing, it only stirs up sadness and brings up memories that I would fain forget forever.

Mr. Chairman, it was not the reduction of the duty on iron ore that produced the disaster to which I have adverted, although the Wilson bill reduced the tariff on iron ore from 75 cents a ton to 40 cents a ton. That did not very seriously affect the situation. It was because the reduction of the tariff brought into this country the products of foreign labor and produced idleness among millions of workingmen in the United States. This made it impossible for the other industries in the country to consume the products of iron and steel as they had been doing, and the result was to kill the demand for the raw material—the iron ore—the consumption of which was reduced from over 9,000,000 tons in 1892 to less than 6,000,000 tons in 1895.

I profess, Mr. Chairman, to be a progressive Republican, but I am not one of those that is progressing out of the Republican Party and into the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not one of those who are willing to make an onslaught on the doctrine of protection for any reason, for I interpret that to mean an onslaught on the Republican Party. The progressiveness in which I believe expresses itself in achievement for the good, the happiness, and the prosperity of the people of the United States, and does not spend itself in carrying around a perpetual grouch. [Applause.]

Some time ago, in the last Congress, a number of us on this side of the aisle organized in order to produce a reform, as we felt, in the rules of this House, to change conditions that to us seemed intolerable. I was one of that number, and I have no apology to make for the part I took in that contest. But what was the ultimate purpose of our effort to reform the rules of the House? Was it the destruction of the old Republican Party of which we were adherents? Was it in order that the Government of the country might be turned over to the Democracy, the enemy of protection? Or was it that the error and weakness that we conceived to be in our own party should be removed in order that that party might better carry on its great constructive work for the benefit of the people of the United States?

I believe that every loyal Republican who was in that movement will say with me that the latter was our purpose and not the two former. Differences in a political party that are in no way related to the fundamental principles of that party are evidences of the virility of the party, and are to be commended rather than condemned. But in those things that are fundamental I believe it is the duty of every Republican to stand shoulder to shoulder with his brother Republicans to uphold the principles of the party whose representative, as well as the representative of the people, he is.

If the Republican Party of the United States stands for anything, it stands for adequate protection to American industries and American labor. This principle has been enunciated in every platform of the party from the time of Lincoln down to the present date. In the great debate with Douglas the immortal Lincoln declared that this Nation could not exist half slave and half free. It was true. No more can the Republican Party exist half protection and half free trade. Every Republican, everybody that is with us, I believe, must be a protectionist, and every man who is a free trader or a believer in a tariff for revenue only must inevitably be against us, as I interpret party principles and party platforms.

I see signs, Mr. Chairman, that some of our Republican brethren are being enticed away from the old faith; being urged to worship at new shrines. They are led to believe that the great doctrine of protection is not so important as other issues which are claimed to be uppermost in the minds of the people of the country. "Reform!" "Progressive policies!" "Bring the Government back to the people!" These are very catchy words in these days, and many of both parties are giving adherence to these reform or progressive policies, as they are called, and are following after that democracy which some are so zealously preaching without having a very definite idea as to what any of these things mean or just what new perfections any of these new policies are to bring into our politics. As a result of this indefiniteness it is easy for all kinds of cranks and demagogues to catch the ear of the public by loudly proclaiming themselves to be progressives or reformers or advocates of the rights of the people.

Everyone will probably agree that there is plenty of need for reform in our politics. There always has been this need, and the same need will doubtless remain after the present somewhat hysterical wave that is now sweeping over the country shall have spent its force.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The recent elections in California are not what are referred to by the gentleman from California as being hysterical, are they? I refer to the judicial recall, for example.

Mr. HAYES. Most of the things advocated by the progressives in California I approved and fought for in the campaign last fall in my State, but I am obliged to say to the gentleman that I can not give my adherence to the recall of the judiciary. I have not time now to discuss it, but I fought it in the campaign, and I am still opposed to it.

The first necessity is that the great indefiniteness that is generally characterizing the present movement should be removed. Effective results can only come when we have a clear conception of the evils that we are trying to correct and the remedies that are proposed to correct them. "Those who, without any concrete program of reforms, are stirring a vague sense of the rottenness of the present order are doing but an ill service." "To wrench the superlatives of the English language merely to produce a general atmosphere of suspicion, granted that the suspicion may perhaps be justified, is a very questionable public service." As one of the greatest of living Americans has well said, "To assail the great and admitted evils of our political and industrial life with such crude and sweeping generalizations as to include decent men in the general condemnation means in the end the searing of the public conscience."

Wild propagandists of unrest and discontent; furious declaimers against the entire existing order; preachers of repression and destruction who propose no substitute for that which they propose to destroy or a substitute which would be much worse than the present evils; general aspersers of the characters of our public men, and dealers in sweeping generalizations and denunciations of everybody and everything except their own fads and faddists—such men as these, whether in public life or out of it, are no safe leaders at this time.

It seems to me there is a present urgent need of quitting this general howl against even those men and those things that deserve condemnation and actually proposing something concrete and practical.

Let us get down out of the clouds and the nebulous milky way, get our feet once more onto the earth, and strive for some definite and attainable object. Let there be less talking, denunciation, and demagogic politics, and more doing; let us formulate some definite, concrete reforms that will add to the prosperity and happiness of the people, instead of destroying both, and then get in and actually fight for them, as we did for the amendment of the House Rules and as the Republicans of California did in the last campaign, and we shall have a chance of accomplishing something beneficial to the people of the country and something worthy of ourselves and of our high professions.

One would think, to hear some of our professed reformers talk, that corruption and malfeasance in office are almost universal among our public men; that most of the men having seats in the Congress of the United States are under the pay of the so-called interests; that the great trusts and other financial and industrial hobgoblins have the National Government so completely in control that it has ceased to be representative of the people and has come to represent only those great interests; in short, that the system of government established by the Fathers of the Republic has broken down completely and proven itself a failure, so far as the protection of the liberties and rights of the people is involved.

This dark picture is a very great exaggeration. There never was a time in the history of the country when there was so little corruption and official wrongdoing as now. Simply because men do not worship at our particular political altar we are not justified in starting a political inquisition and trying and condemning them for political heresy. A man does not need to be a "sissy" or a weakling to be fair to his opponents in political as in other warfare. And most fair and honest men have come to know from experience that while there will always be differences of opinion about governmental policies, honesty of purpose and patriotism are never all on one side of any great public question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

At the height of the French Revolution the pointing of a finger of suspicion by Robespierre or any other of those men who were posing as the only defenders of liberty and the rights of the people was enough to send to the guillotine the man against whom the suspicion was directed, whether he were guilty or innocent.

And in this great country we seem to have come to a time when certain political self-righteous individuals who proclaim themselves as the only Simon-pure patriots can raise suspicion in the public mind against a man by simply calling attention to the fact that the suspected individual does not agree with these Simon-pure patriots. "These are my sentiments," in effect, they proclaim. "I am an honest man; I am a patriot. If you disagree with me you are a reactionary; you are in the pay of the interests; you are a public enemy; you are a traitor to your country." And the atmosphere of suspicion which is now filling the public mind is such that men thus accused are often condemned by a large percentage of the people, without any specifications of wrongdoing or any proof whatever.

In this connection I say—and I measure my words when I say them—that I have nothing but contempt and execration for the methods that some are using against the present occupant of the White House. [Applause on the Republican side.] They do not hesitate to use exaggeration, misrepresentation, and even falsehood, in order to bring odium upon the head of the Nation. Upon everything that he proposes they cast suspicion; they belittle and ridicule without any reference to the merits of the proposition or the suggestion that he makes. They are even willing oftentimes to expose their own insincerity and lack of consistency in order, as they express it, that they may "put the President of the United States in a hole." I have not always agreed with the policies of the present occupant of the White House, but I recognize, as I believe every fair-minded man must recognize, that never in our history have we had a President who was more honest in purpose, more patriotic, more courageous in the advocacy of that which he believed for the highest interests of the people of the United States than the man who is President of the United States to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mud slinging, vituperation, and personal politics are certainly to be condemned in every local election or campaign; and if locally these things are disgusting and should be condemned by every true lover of decency, they are not to be commended when they strive to rise to the dignity of national politics. And I am glad of this opportunity, unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly, to condemn this kind of politics, whatever its purpose, no matter against whom it may be employed.

And so far as the Government of the United States ceasing to be representative, I want to assert here what every man on this floor knows as well as I know, that there never was a time in the history of the Government of the United States when it was so completely representative of the people as it is to-day. Every man on this floor knows that any question in which a considerable number of the people are interested can get a hearing and a fair hearing upon this floor at the hands of the representatives of the people, and that if any measure is being demanded by a majority of the people of the United States no power on earth can prevent its passage, whether that measure be wise or unwise.

Some public officials may, perhaps, be justly charged with striving to be too representative of the people. Instead of an attempt at leadership, there is often too much of a tendency to be slavishly subservient to the popular demand. The result is too little statesmanship and altogether too much nauseating, demagogic politics.

This is becoming known to the people as well as to most of the membership of this House. An experienced business man, a friend of mine, puts it in these very caustic words:

The chief trouble just now is that there are too many men in public office who are overtrained as lawyers and politicians and undertrained as business men. A majority of the Members of Congress are inspired more than anything else by a desire for reelection, and the commercial prosperity of the United States is a secondary consideration. As it seems to be popular to attack the business interests of the country, a majority of the Congressmen and Senators are competing with each other to see who can go to the farthest extreme in that respect. As a result the financial situation is unsettled, capital is timid, manufacturing interests are depressed, and many laborers are out of employment.

I do not indorse to the full extent these words, yet I think there is a vast amount of truth in them.

But the present peculiar condition of the public mind is only an illustration of the fact that history repeats itself. In 1838 on the floor of the Senate of the United States, Daniel Webster, after picturing the prosperity of New England at that time, used these words:

Mr. President, such is the state of things actually existing in the country, and of which I have now given you a sample. And yet there are persons who constantly clamor against this state of things. They call it aristocracy. They excite the poor to make war upon the rich, while in truth they know not who are either rich or poor. They complain of oppression, speculation, and the pernicious influence of accumulated wealth. They cry out loudly against all banks and corporations, and all the means by which small capitals become united, in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on a mad hostility against all established institutions. They would choke up the fountains of industry and dry all its streams. In a country of unbounded liberty they clamor against oppression. In a country of perfect equality they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where property is more equally divided than anywhere else, they rend the air with the shouting of agrarian doctrines. In a country where the wages of labor are high beyond all parallel and where lands are cheap and the means of living low, they would teach the laborer that he is but an oppressed slave. Sir, what can such men want? What do they mean? They can want nothing, sir, but to enjoy the fruits of other men's labor. They can mean nothing but disturbance and disorder, the diffusion of corrupt principles and the destruction of the moral sentiments and moral habits of society. A licentiousness of feeling and of action is sometimes produced by prosperity itself. Men can not always resist the temptation to which they are exposed by the very abundance of the bounties of Providence and the very happiness of their own condition; as the steed full of the pasture will sometimes throw himself against its inclosures, break away from its confinement, and, feeling now free from needless restraint, betake himself to the moors and barrens where want, ere long, brings him to his senses, and starvation and death close his career.

Did the orator have in mind in this last illustration the fact that sometimes hunger is the only thing that will bring the wild-eyed agitator and his followers to their senses? Can it be possible that 75 years ago they had in this country "calamity howlers" of the same brand as those of our day? These words of the great Webster would certainly lead us to conclude that not all the demagogues and preachers of discontent live in our time. [Applause.]

In what I have said, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be understood as condemning radicals in politics, much less those who honestly strive for real reforms. Radicals in politics, as in other lines of social and human activity, have their uses, for they often attract the attention of people to faults which otherwise would escape public attention.

Their very exaggeration of the evils of their time may help to do this. They are one extreme, and the nonprogressive conservative, or as he has come to be called in these days "the reactionary," is the other extreme. The truth is that political wisdom, as a rule, is not with either of these extremes, but somewhere between the two. There are times when the advocate of revolution may be a public necessity, but as an ordinary proposition nations, as individuals and everything else in the universe, progress by evolution and not by revolution.

Nearly all my life I have fought for the betterment of political conditions. In the struggle for this betterment I have not hesitated, upon occasion, to fight the organization of my own party. I have done the same on the floor of this House and, should occasion require, should not hesitate to do it again. But I believe in government by parties. And having given my adhesion to a political party I should hesitate long before opposing here or elsewhere the principles that lie at the foundation of that party. Certainly if I found myself wholly out of touch with my fellows of what had hitherto been my own political faith I should be honest with myself, honest with my party, honest with the public, and unhesitatingly take my place on the other side of the political fence.

Factional strife carried to the point of the destruction of the party within which it rages has never accomplished anything in this country, and, in my judgment, never will. And the talk that we hear in some quarters about a third party to be made up of the progressives of both political parties can never be productive of any substantial benefit to the country, if we are to believe the lessons of our past history; for no third party movement ever accomplished much of value in the United States. The "Quids," during the time of John Randolph, who were a sort of offshoot or faction of the Democratic Party, prompted more by pique or disappointed personal ambition than by patriotism or any well-grounded purpose, accomplished nothing of importance, but only made its adherents ridiculous and odious.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What was the Republican Party itself but a third party, founded on the exigencies of the time?

Mr. HAYES. The Republican Party was not a third party. I have not time to go into the history of that time, but the old Whig Party had gone to pieces and the Republican Party was a reorganization of the Whig Party, also drawing to its fold many of the more progressive men of the United States, who had hitherto belonged to the Democratic Party. The Republican Party was no third party. It was the second great political party in the United States, the Democratic Party being the other.

Mr. FOCHT. Founded on protection, the old Whig Party.

Mr. HAYES. Exactly, the Republican Party followed along the same lines, except in the matter of slavery. The "Know-Nothing" Party, which at one time threatened to become formidable, went down and out of existence as rapidly as it came into prominence, leaving behind but disgrace and obliquity for all its adherents. The Free-Soil and the Constitution Parties were organized efforts to avoid the portentous conflict impending before the Civil War broke out. They failed entirely in their purpose. The so-called Liberal Republican movement, during the administration of President Grant, while perhaps it called the public attention to certain evils in the public service, was swallowed up by the Democracy and left no permanent or beneficial results behind. The Greenback and Populist Parties were nothing more than rallying cries for wild and visionary theorists and the disciples of failure and unrest, and left us nothing but a lesson which it is well to heed just at this time, viz, that we should be rather slow to accept, as panaceas for all our political ills, unsound or new and untried theories. The truth is, there is no room, and there never has been room in this country, for more than two great political parties. And the man who desires to work lasting political reforms will work for those reforms within one of the great parties, rather than seek to create a separate and distinct organization.

Fellow Republicans, shall history repeat itself? In the years 1893 to 1897 shall we live over again the awful experiences of 1893 to 1897? God forbid! The responsibility of preventing this is upon us. Some of us may not like the generals in command of the Republican army, but let us remember that the battle is not to be won by the generals, but by the great voting army of protectionists. Some of us may have just cause for personal grievance or resentment. This is the time to forget it. Some of us may not like the minor things for which the great army is fighting or we may think it should be marshaling for something else. Drop that; there will be plenty of time to fight out the differences among ourselves after next November. For 50 years the Republican Party has written the most glorious piece of history that was ever penned. Like good soldiers, let us close up the ranks, let us march to victory next November and write four years more of that same glorious Republican history. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20182, the chemical tariff schedule, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, for 10 days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. SHEPPARD, for 30 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. ROTHERMEL, for 10 days, on account of important business.

MINORITY VIEWS ON THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the pending tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] asks unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the pending bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.]. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. (H. Rept. 326, pt. 2.)

AGREEMENT TO CLOSE GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and myself have reached an agreement as to time, and instead of having a late session to-night, if the House will agree to it, we have agreed to have one hour's debate in the morning, the time to be divided between the two sides, one-half an hour to each side.

The SPEAKER. That is, general debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. General debate. I therefore ask in lieu of the agreement heretofore made that general debate shall consist of one hour to-morrow morning, to be equally divided between the two sides, the gentleman from Pennsylvania to control one half of that time and the other half to be controlled by myself, and that at the expiration of that time general debate shall close and the bill be read under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the agreement entered into this morning be modified so that general debate shall be limited to one hour, one half of which is to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and then the bill shall be taken up and read under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, February 20, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Buffalo Harbor, N. Y. (H. Doc. No. 550); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Niagara River, N. Y. (H. Doc. No. 549); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the result of an investigation made by The Adjutant General of the Army as to the sums of money actually expended by the State of Texas, between 1855 and 1860, in payment of State Volunteers, etc. (H. Doc. No. 551); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 4521) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer William A. Hawgood, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 332), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 338).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the report of the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission, authorized by joint resolution No. 41, approved June 25, 1910, "To make a thorough investigation of the subject of employers' liability and workmen's compensation, and to submit a report through the President to the Congress of the United States."

The commission recommends a carefully drawn bill, entitled "A bill to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries resulting in disability or death to employees of common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." This bill works out in detail a compensation for accidental injuries to employees of common carriers in interstate railroad business, on the theory of insuring each employee against the results of injury received in the course of the employment, without reference to his contributory negligence, and without any of the rules obtaining in the common law limiting the liability of the employer in such cases. The only case in which no compensation is to be allowed by the act is where the injury or death of the employee is occasioned by his willful intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another or when the injury results from his intoxication while on duty.

It is unnecessary to go into the details of the bill. They are, however, most admirably worked out. They provide for a medical and hospital service for the injured man, for a notice of the injury to the employer, where such notice is not obviously given by the accident itself; for the fixing of the recovery by agreement; if not by agreement, by an official adjuster, to be confirmed by the court, and, if a jury is demanded, to be passed on by a jury. The amount of recovery is regulated in proportion to the wages received and the more or less serious character of the injury where death does not ensue, specific provision being made for particular injuries in so far as they can be specified. The compensation is to be made in the form of annual payments for a number of years or for life. The fees to be paid to attorneys are specifically limited by the act. The remedies offered are exclusive of any other remedies. The statistical investigation seems to show that under this act the cost to the railroads would be, perhaps, 25 per cent more than the total cost which they now incur.

The report of the commission has been very able and satisfactory, the investigations have been most thorough, and the discussion of the constitutional questions which have arisen in respect to the validity of the bill is of the highest merit.

Three objections to the validity of the bill of course occur:

In the first place, the question arises whether under the provisions of the commerce clause the bill could be considered to be a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. That seems to be already settled by the decision of the Supreme Court in the employers' liability case.

The second question is whether the making of these remedies exclusive and the compelling of the railroad companies to meet obligations arising from injuries, for which the railroad would not be liable under the common law, is a denial of the due process of law which is enjoined upon Congress by the fifth amendment to the Constitution in dealing with the property rights. This question the report takes up, and in an exhaustive review of the authorities makes clear, as it seems to me, the validity of the act. This is the question which in the Court of Appeals of the State of New York was decided adversely to the validity of the compensation act adopted by the legislature of that State. How far that act and the one here proposed differ it is unnecessary to state. It is sufficient to say that the argument of the commission is most convincing to show that the police power of the Government exercised in the regulation of interstate commerce is quite sufficient to justify the imposition upon the interstate railroad companies of the liability for the injuries to its employees on an insurance basis.

The third objection is that the right of trial by jury, guaranteed by the seventh amendment, is denied. As a matter of fact, the right is preserved in this act by permitting a jury to pass on the issue when duly demanded, in accordance with the limitation of the act.

I sincerely hope that this act will pass. I deem it one of the great steps of progress toward a satisfactory solution of an important phase of the controversies between employer and employee that has been proposed within the last two or three decades. The old rules of liability under the common law were adapted to a different age and condition and were evidently drawn by men imbued with the importance of preserving the employers from burdensome or unjust liability. It was treated as a personal matter of each employee, and the employer and the employee were put on a level of dealing, which, however it may have been in the past, certainly creates injustice to the employee under the present conditions.

One of the great objections to the old common-law method of settling questions of this character was the lack of uniformity in the recoveries made by injured employees and by the representatives of those who suffered death. Frequently meritorious cases that appealed strongly to every sense of human justice were shut out by arbitrary rules limiting the liability of the employer. On the other hand, often by perjured evidence and the undue emotional generosity of the jury, recoveries were given far in excess of the real injury, and sometimes on facts that hardly justified recovery at all. Now, under this system the tendency will be to create as nearly a uniform system as can be devised; there will be recoveries in every case, and they will be limited by the terms of the law so as to be reasonable.

The great injustice of the present system, by which recoveries of verdicts of any size do not result in actual benefit to the injured person because of the heavy expense of the litigation and the fees charged by the counsel for the plaintiff, will disappear under this new law, by which the fees of the counsel are limited to a very reasonable amount. The cases will be disposed of most expeditiously under this system, and the money will be distributed for the support of the injured person over a number of years, so as to make its benefit greater and more secure.

Of course the great object of this act is to secure justice to the weaker party under existing modern conditions, but a result hardly less important will follow from this act that I can not fail to mention.

The administration of justice to-day is clogged in every court by the great number of suits for damages for personal injury. The settlement of such cases by this system will serve to reduce the burden of our courts one-half by taking the cases out of court and disposing of them by this short cut. The remainder of the business in the courts will thus have greater attention from the judges, and will be disposed of with much greater dispatch. In every way, therefore, the act demands your earnest consideration, and I sincerely hope that it may be passed before the adjournment of this session of Congress.

There accompanies the letter of transmittal of Senator SUTHERLAND not only the report of the commission, but also the hearings of witnesses by the commission, all of which is herewith submitted.

The amendments were, in line 7, after the words "West Virginia," to strike out the words "and the sum of" and insert the words "at a cost not to exceed"; and at the end of the bill, after the word "dollars," in line 8, to strike out the words "is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated," so as to make the bill read:

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the purchase of a site for the erection of a post office and public building at New Martinsville, Wetzel County, W. Va."

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I introduce a bill to carry out the recommendations made by the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission. The report of that commission, transmitted to-day to Congress by the President of the United States, has been laid before the Senate and read. The bill will affect something like 1,700,000 railroad employees, and I am advised that there will be a very large demand for copies. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and that 25,000 additional copies be printed for the use of that committee.

The bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, without objection, the order for the printing of 25,000 extra copies will be entered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I observe the Senator from Utah has asked that the extra copies shall be for the use of the committee. I trust the Senator will let them go to the Senate document room, where we can get them on call.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no objection, Mr. President, to some of them going to the document room, but I think the larger portion of them ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Say, 10,000 for the use of the document room.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the order be made in that way, then—that 10,000 shall be for the use of the document room and 15,000 for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries resulting in disability or death to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, for the use of the document room of the Senate, and that there be printed 15,000 copies of said bill for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERNATIONAL DRY LAND CONGRESS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the next annual meeting of the International Dry Land Congress, to be held at Lethbridge, Alberta, Canada, October 21 to 26, 1912, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

PRESERVATION OF FUR SEALS.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16571) to give effect to the convention between the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, Japan, and Russia for the preservation and protection of the fur seals and sea otter which frequent the waters of the North Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington July 7, 1911, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL ARBITRATION TREATIES.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that on Thursday, the 29th of February, with the permission of the Senate, I will address the Senate upon the question of the general arbitration treaties with Great Britain and France.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. POINDEXTER. By unanimous consent I ask leave to have considered an amendment to correct a typographical or clerical error in Senate bill 2194, which is on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to amend the bill, in line 6, on page 1, by striking out the word "law" and inserting the words "at large, page," so that it will read "Statutes at Large, page 991."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not yet before the Senate. Does the Senator ask to amend a report?

Mr. POINDEXTER. To amend a bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands. The bill is on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill would have to be under consideration, of course, to have the amendment acted upon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood that it could be acted upon by unanimous consent. It is to correct a mere clerical error.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURTON. What is the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2194) to amend section 2288 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homestead entries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is simply to permit the Senator from Washington at the present time to offer an amendment and not that the bill be definitely disposed of. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, after the word "Statutes," it is proposed to strike out the word "law" and to insert the words "at Large, page," so as to read:

That section 2288 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of March 3, 1905, chapter 1424, Thirty-third Statutes at Large, page 991, be amended so as to read as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 136, which is a question of the highest privilege before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the resolution.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 136, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges relative to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON.

Mr. LODGE. Is the resolution now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been called up as a privileged matter and is now before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now renew my request made on yesterday, that the remainder of the report may be read. By that I mean the views of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], the views of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and also the views submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which were, I understand, filed yesterday. I want the whole report read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, before that is proceeded with, I should like to inquire if the views of the Senator from Washington and his associates on the committee have yet been printed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been printed and are now in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. BRISTOW. They have not yet been distributed. I understood from the discussion yesterday that those views were to be incorporated in the first volume of the testimony. Now, where are they to be found?

Mr. HEYBURN. They were not incorporated in the first volume. They were printed as other minority views are printed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why should not those views have been printed the same as the views of the Senator from Utah and those of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. They were not in existence when the order was made for printing the record. The order was made seven days before they were in existence, and they could not very well be printed.

Mr. BRISTOW. But this volume was not printed until yesterday, if I understand correctly.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was because of the disobedience of the printing clerk to the order of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why should not the minority views have been incorporated in this volume, then, if it could have been done, the report not having been printed at the time?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because it was not deemed either necessary or advisable to permit the order of the Senate to be violated in a roundabout way by deferring for a week compliance with the order of the Senate—I will not use the word "surreptitiously," but it is close to it, and it would be difficult to find another word to fit it—withholding compliance with the order of the Senate for a week in order that some individual might accomplish a purpose that was not in harmony with that of the Senate when it ordered the record printed.

Mr. BRISTOW. The result is—

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not understand the Senator's reference to this "purpose." What was the "purpose" which the Senator says the printing clerk had in view in delaying the printing and which was not in accordance with the sentiment of the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. The period of oracles having passed, I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not understand, Mr. President, that it would require an oracle for the Senator to answer the question when he has stated to the Senate that there was such a purpose. Now, I understand the Senator to say that, notwithstanding his previous assertion, he does not know of any such purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator had better defer that assertion until he reads the record of what I said. I said "what the record will show; not what the Senator says I said."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator deny that he just made the statement that the clerk was withholding the printing of this volume to accomplish a purpose that was not in accord with the sentiments of the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Idaho is not on trial, nor is he triable at the hands of any Member of this body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very true, Mr. President. I have no desire to undertake to put the Senator on trial. I simply asked the question for information. It appears to me very evident that there was some purpose or motive back of the Senator's insistence, which he made on yesterday before the Senate, that this volume should have been published immediately; and undoubtedly the Senator stated that there was a purpose or motive in the refusal to print it in accordance with the orders of the committee. I think the Senate is entitled to know what the purpose or motive is, and it has not been disclosed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will know, if I have an opportunity to state it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am asking the Senator to state it now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Still the Senator is asking for it. I shall not need to be asked again.

I insisted on it because it was the order of the Senate. I need charge no one with any motive in insisting that the order of the Senate should be complied with. That order was that the record be printed. The specific terms of the order required nothing to be printed that was not in existence.

The Senator is mistaken when he undertakes to state what he says I said in regard to the motive of those who were responsible for its not being done. I disclaimed knowing. The Senator asked me. I told him I had no oracle to appeal to. That was equivalent to saying that I had no means of information. Nor do I care anything whatever as to what actuated them, and I am not going to stand here to attack them or to defend them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it the Senator's idea that the purpose in delaying the printing of this volume was to incorporate in it the views of the minority of the committee? And was the Senator's objection to further delay in order to prevent the views of the minority of the committee being printed in the volume?

Mr. HEYBURN. Those are two questions. The Senator asks me for my views on the subject. If he will submit his inquiry in writing, I will answer it in writing. He asks me two questions at once, and while my memory is reasonably good I do not care to take chances on being confused.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is very evident, Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. Why, this is as dry a haul as was ever experienced in debate. There is nothing in it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In what?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is nothing to be gained by this inquiry. The testimony in the record is printed this morning, and it is before the Senate, and the Senate has proceeded to its consideration. What is the object of this, except simply to stir up discussion? I am not going to spend a minute on it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should not like to stir up the Senator to a discussion. I want to avoid that. I do not desire to engage in discussion at this time. I confess that it is a dry haul. I have not gotten any information out of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. We might now safely proceed with the order—or the request, which is an order—that the report of the committee and the views of Senators in support of or against it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], as the Chair understands, was to begin the reading of the report with the views of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. LODGE. And to read all the views of all the Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF MR. HEYBURN IN SUPPORT OF THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

The subcommittee having reported to the whole committee in favor of ISAAC STEPHENSON, I desire to submit herewith the reasons which actuated me in arriving at that conclusion.

JURISDICTION.

On August 15, 1911, the United States Senate adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections or any subcommittee thereof be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, and report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON, as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices; that said committee or subcommittee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, to hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee or chairman of the subcommittee."

Pursuant to the authority given by said resolution the Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed a subcommittee consisting of Senators HEYBURN, SUTHERLAND, BRADLEY, PAYNTER, and POMERENE, with full powers "to investigate said charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin relating to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin."

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE.

In performance of said duty the subcommittee met at Milwaukee, Wis., on October 2, 1911, in the Federal Building, a quorum of said subcommittee being present.

The chairman announced that the subcommittee would recognize a duly authorized representative of the State of Wisconsin, in view of the fact that the State had submitted, through its governor, to the Senate of the United States the charges to be investigated. No one appearing, the chairman then instructed the secretary of the subcommittee to communicate with the governor and attorney general of the State and advise them that the committee was in session in Milwaukee for the purpose of investigating the charges aforesaid, and to inquire whether or not the State desired to be represented at the hearing, and, pursuant to such instruction, the secretary sent the following communication to the governor:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., October 2, 1911.

Hon. FRANCIS E. MCGOVERN,
Governor of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.:

A subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate, duly appointed, with instructions to investigate the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, as recommended by the Legislature of Wisconsin as provided in joint resolution 58 of said legislature, has entered upon the investigation in the Federal Building, in the city of Milwaukee. As the State appears to be unrepresented by counsel, you are requested to advise the committee whether or not it is the desire of the State to be represented by counsel before this committee; and if so, designate in writing such person to represent the State.

W. B. HEYBURN, Chairman.

To which communication the governor replied, as follows:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Madison, Wis., October 3, 1911.

Hon. W. B. HEYBURN,
Chairman Subcommittee of the United States Senate
Committee on Privileges and Elections, Milwaukee, Wis.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your telegram of yesterday, in which you request me to advise your committee "whether or not it is the desire of the State to be represented by counsel" before your subcommittee, permit me to say that I find there is very serious doubt that I have any power to act in the matter. Joint resolution 58, to which you refer, confers no such authority. It simply requests the United States Senate "to investigate the manner, means, and methods by and through which ISAAC STEPHENSON secured his election to the United States Senate," recommends to the district attorney of Dane County that prosecutions be commenced against all persons shown to have committed perjury in the senatorial inquiry in this city, and suggests that prosecutions be commenced in other counties of the State for such violations of the corrupt-practices or bribery statutes as the evidence may justify.

In the absence of any specific authority conferred by this joint resolution the only other possible source is chapter 268 of the laws of Wisconsin for the year 1911. Careful consideration of this statute leaves me in doubt as to whether it confers power upon me to employ at the expense of the State counsel to attend the investigation your subcommittee is now conducting. Nor can I see that much good is likely to come from such employment. Your invitation comes so late as practically to preclude the possibility of anyone whom I might select rendering any real service to your committee or materially assisting in the investigation now in progress. That investigation has already begun. The transactions to be inquired into are numerous and involved, as appears from the fact that the testimony already taken occupied many months of the time of committees of the State legislature and now fills a number of large volumes of printed reports. To be of service counsel for the State should have been employed months ago. I say this with no feeling of personal responsibility in the matter for the reason that until your telegram came yesterday there was no ground for anticipating that the appearance of an attorney for the State at this hearing would be acceptable to your committee. Indeed, more than a week ago, under date of September 25, the Associated Press quoted you as having expressed yourself as chairman of the subcommittee as follows: "The State of Wisconsin will not have an attorney in the investigation of the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON by the United States Senate committee. This hearing is under the jurisdiction of the United States Senate, which does not recognize the State as a party to the investigation. This is an investigation, not a trial."

An additional reason why I should not avail myself of your invitation at this time is furnished by the practice of other committees charged with duties similar to yours. So far as I know no State has been represented by counsel at any of these investigations. The work has been done either by the members of the committee alone or by counsel of their own choosing. At any rate, the responsibility for a thorough, searching inquiry is upon your subcommittee acting as the agent of the United States Senate in determining a question relative to the "election, returns, and qualifications" of one of its own Members. Neither the State of Wisconsin nor its legislature desires to assume the rôle of prosecutor or to sustain any other relation to this investigation than that of petitioner for a thorough, fearless, and impartial inquiry.

For the present, therefore, I shall take no action concerning the matter mentioned in your telegram. Assuring you, however, of my appreciation of your consideration in extending the invitation, I am,

Very truly, yours,

FRANCIS E. MCGOVERN.

The chairman inquired whether or not counsel were present to represent Mr. STEPHENSON. Whereupon Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, Mr. W. E. Black, and Mr. H. A. J. Upham appeared on his behalf and were recognized by the committee.

The joint resolution and specific charges certified to the United States Senate by the governor of Wisconsin were then read. (Transcript, pp. 4 and 5.)

Before entering upon the examination of witnesses by the committee Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, of counsel for Mr. STEPHENSON, requested leave to make a statement, which leave was granted. (Transcript, pp. 6-23.)

The subcommittee then proceeded to the examination of witnesses and documents, which examination occupied 25 days, during which time 116 witnesses were sworn and examined, 36 affidavits received, and upward of 2,100 pages of printed testimony taken, which testimony, affidavits, and exhibits are herewith offered as a part of the report of the subcommittee.

The subcommittee was directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against Mr. STEPHENSON. These charges were set forth in the communication of the governor of Wisconsin, and the papers accompanying the same, certified to the United States Senate, among which was the joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Wisconsin on June 26, 1911, which is found on page 2 of the transcript.

The charges referred to in the resolution under which the subcommittee acted are as follows:

SPECIFIC CHARGES.

1. That ISAAC STEPHENSON, of Marinette, Wis., now United States Senator and a candidate for reelection, did, as such candidate for reelection, give to one E. A. Edmonds, of the city of Appleton, Wis., an elector of the State of Wisconsin and said city of Appleton, a valuable thing, to wit, a sum of money in excess of $100,000, and approximating the sum of $250,000, as a consideration for some act to be done by said E. A. Edmonds, in relation to the primary election held on the 1st day of September, 1908, which consideration was paid prior to said primary election, and that said ISAAC STEPHENSON was at the time of such payment a candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator at such primary, and did by such acts as above set forth violate section 4543b of the statutes.

2. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, prior to said primary, pay to said Edmonds above-mentioned sums with the design that said Edmonds should pay to other electors of this State, out of said sums above mentioned and other sums of money received by said Edmonds from said ISAAC STEPHENSON, prior to said primary, sums ranging from $5 per day to $1,000 in bulk, as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to said primary by said electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON as such candidate, in violation of said section.

3. That with full knowledge and with instructions from said ISAAC STEPHENSON, as to how and for what purposes said sums were to be expended, said sums were so paid as above stated to said Edmonds by said ISAAC STEPHENSON and that said sums were paid as above stated for the purposes above stated and also for the purpose of bribing and corrupting a sufficient number of the electors of the State of Wisconsin to encompass the nomination of said ISAAC STEPHENSON at said primary for the office of United States Senator.

4. That in pursuance of the purposes and design above stated said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, pay to one U. C. Keller, of Sauk County, an elector of this State, the sum of $300 as a consideration for some act to be done by said Keller for said STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

5. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, paid to one Hambright, of Racine, Wis., large sums of money as a consideration for some act to be done by said Hambright for said STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, said Hambright being then an elector of this State, corruptly and unlawfully.

6. That in further pursuance of the purposes and design above stated said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, pay to one Roy Morse, of Fond du Lac, Wis., then an elector of this State, the sum of $1,000 as a consideration for some act to be done by said Morse for said ISAAC STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, and corruptly and unlawfully.

7. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, paid to divers persons, then electors of the county of Grant, Wis., ranging from $5 per day and upward, as a consideration for some act to be done by said several electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

8. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design, said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, did pay to divers persons who were at such time electors in this State a consideration for some act to be done for said ISAAC STEPHENSON by such electors preliminary to such primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

9. That in further pursuance of such purposes and designs said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to said primary, did pay to electors of this State, who were of a different political opinion and who held to other political principles than those of the Republican Party, more particularly Democrats, sums of money as a consideration for some act to be done by such electors for said ISAAC STEPHENSON preliminary to said primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

10. That in further pursuance of such purposes and design said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, prior to such primary, did offer to pay to Edward Pollock, of Lancaster, Wis., certain sums of money, as editor of the Teller, a newspaper published in said city of Lancaster, Wis., and to other editors of newspapers who were at such time electors of this State, and for the purpose of purchasing the editorial support of such editors and as a consideration of something to be done relating to such primary, corruptly and unlawfully.

11. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, prior to such primary, by and through his agents, promise and agree to pay to one Lester Tilton, a then resident and elector of this State, and residing at the city of Neillsville, Wis., a sum in excess of $500 to procure or aid in procuring the nomination of said Lester Tilton to the assembly of this State from Clark County, and did offer to give to said Lester Tilton a sum in excess of $500 if said Lester Tilton would become a candidate for the assembly from said Clark County if said Lester Tilton would support said ISAAC STEPHENSON for the office of United States Senator, all of which is in violation of sections 4542b and 4543b of the statutes.

12. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON did, by and through his agents, give and promise and pay or agree to pay to other electors of this State sums of money to procure or aid in procuring the nomination of such electors to the senate and assembly of this State other than those electors residing in the district where said ISAAC STEPHENSON resides.

13. That E. M. Heyzer and Max Sells, prior to said primary, being at such time employees of the Chicago & North Western Railway Co., a corporation doing business in this State, did contribute and agree to contribute free services as such employees for the purpose to defeat the candidacy of former Assemblyman E. F. Nelson, from the district embracing Florence, Forest, and Langlade Counties, for the nomination for assemblyman from said district, all of which was done with the knowledge and consent and under the direction of said ISAAC STEPHENSON, his agents, and employees, contrary to chapter 492, laws of 1905.

14. That in further pursuance of the purposes and design above set forth said ISAAC STEPHENSON, by and through his agents, did, in addition to paying certain sums as above set forth, offer and agree to pay to electors of this State, prior to said primary, a premium or bonus to those who in his employ carried their respective precincts in such primary for said ISAAC STEPHENSON as such candidate.

15. That said ISAAC STEPHENSON, if claiming an election by virtue of receiving a plurality of votes at such primary, then said ISAAC STEPHENSON has violated chapter 502 of the laws of 1905 by failing and neglecting to file his expense account as provided by said chapter.

16. Charging generally the primary nomination or election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON was obtained by the use of large sums of money corruptly and illegally, by the violation of sections 4542b, 4543b, and 4478b of the statutes relating to illegal voting, bribery, and corruption, and other laws above set forth relating to elections and primary elections.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the roll call 64 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum being present, the Secretary will proceed with the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the views of Mr. HEYBURN in support of the report of the committee, as follows:

John J. Blaine, a State senator, who made the said 16 specific charges, which constituted the basis of the legislative investigation, was examined in detail as to each of such charges and failed to sustain any of them, either by his own testimony or by reference to the testimony of others. The charges were made on information and belief according to his own testimony. He seemed upon examination to have no information upon which any belief as to their truth could be based.

An inspection of his testimony (transcript, p. 592, etc.) will fully justify the conclusion of the subcommittee that such charges were not sustained.

These charges were investigated by two legislative committees; first, by a joint committee, which submitted a report which was not finally acted upon; second, by a committee of three members of the State senate, only one member of which was a member of the legislature when the report of that committee was made.

The time within which the joint legislative committee might take testimony and report was limited by the legislature to expire on the 13th day of April, 1909, and on that day the said committee met and adopted a resolution that each member make an outline of his proposed report and submit it at a later date for discussion before the committee.

Said committee then adjourned subject to the call of the chairman of the senate or assembly committee.

This ended the work of the joint investigating committee.

The State senate, acting independently of the assembly and in view of the expiration of the time within which the joint committee might finish its work, adopted a resolution on March 25, 1909, authorizing the president of the senate to appoint a committee consisting of three members to complete the investigation that had been carried on by the joint committee and to "further fully, fairly, and thoroughly investigate the campaign and election of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a United States Senator, and the campaign and election of members of the legislature so far as their election in any way pertains to or affects the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a United States Senator."

SPECIFIC QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR CONSIDERATION.

In the order of their importance the duties of the subcommittee may be classified as follows:

First. To investigate the proceedings by the legislature, including the actions of Senator STEPHENSON and those representing him, during the session of the legislature.

Second. To investigate the campaign and election of members of the legislature so far as their election in any way pertains to or affects the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON as a United States Senator.

Third. The primary election and the campaign.

ELECTION OF A SENATOR BY THE LEGISLATURE.

The law providing for the election of Senators by the legislature is as follows, being chapter 1, title 2, of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

"Sec. 14. The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organizing thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

"Sec. 15. Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house he shall be declared duly elected Senator. But if the same person has not received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to take proceedings as required by this section, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for Senator, and the person who receives a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. If no person receives such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature and shall take at least one vote until a Senator is elected.

"Sec. 16. (Relates to filling vacancies.)

"Sec. 17. (Also relates to the filling of vacancies.)

"Sec. 18. It shall be the duty of the executive of the State from which a Senator has been chosen to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States.

"Sec. 19. The certificate mentioned in the preceding section shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State."

PROCEEDINGS IN THE LEGISLATURE.

The Forty-ninth Legislature of Wisconsin consisted of 33 senators and 100 assemblymen, and convened at the capitol at Madison on January 13, 1909, at 12 o'clock m.

On Thursday, January 14, 1909, the organizing of both houses was complete, and the assembly adjourned until Tuesday, January 19, at 10 o'clock.

The senate organized on January 13, 1909, and on January 14 Senator Husting introduced joint resolution 3, providing for the investigation of the primary election, which was laid over until the next session, and the senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 19, at 10 o'clock a. m.

On Tuesday, January 26, the senate considered joint resolution 3, and a substitute was introduced by Senator Blaine. (Senate Journal, pp. 72-77.) This substitute contains the specific charges.

On January 26, 1909, a vote was taken on the election of United States Senator, each house voting separately.

In the senate the total number of votes cast was 17. Mr. STEPHENSON received 12 votes, Brown 4, Rummel 1. (Senate Journal, pp. 78-79.)

On the same day, January 26, upon the call of the roll in the assembly, the total number of votes cast for Senator was 84. Mr. STEPHENSON received 60, Neal Brown 16, Jacob Rummel 3, S. A. Cook 2, H. A. Cooper 1, J. H. Stout 1, and John J. Esch 1, which result was announced by the speaker. (Assembly Journal, pp. 74-75.)

On Wednesday, January 27, resolutions were introduced in the senate, among others joint resolution 8, being an arraignment of the United States Senate and a demand for its abolition, introduced by Senator Gaylord. (Senate Journal, p. 86.) It was referred to the committee on Federal relations. This is mentioned in passing only to show the temper of the legislature on the day of the first joint ballot for United States Senator.

At 12 o'clock noon of January 27, 1909, the two houses met in joint convention. The lieutenant governor, presiding, stated:

"Gentlemen of the joint convention, you are assembled here for the purpose of expressing your choice for United States Senator. In order to comply with the Federal law the clerk of the senate and the clerk of the assembly will read from the journal of each house, respectively, the proceedings of the preceding day with reference to the election of a United States Senator."

The Senate Journal (p. 94) and the Assembly Journal (p. 80) records as follows:

"The chief clerk of the senate read the journal of the senate of January 26, 1909, and the chief clerk of the assembly read the journal of the assembly of January 26, 1909.

"The president then said: 'The clerk will call the roll. As your names are called you will arise from your seats and announce the candidate of your choice.'

Senator Hudnall said:

"I rise to protest against any other proceedings being taken in the joint assembly at this time except the announcement of the presiding officer that Hon. ISAAC STEPHENSON is elected to the United States Senate for the term commencing March 4, 1909. I do that for the reason that it appears from the journal of the senate that the total number of votes cast for persons were 17, of which ISAAC STEPHENSON received 12, Neal Brown 4, Jacob Rummel 1, and the journal of the assembly shows that of the members who voted for persons there were 60 for STEPHENSON, 16 for Brown, and 3 for Jacob Rummel; and it further appears from both journals of senate and assembly that ISAAC STEPHENSON received a majority of all the votes cast in each house.

"It devolves, then, upon the president of this joint assembly to declare ISAAC STEPHENSON duly elected to the United States Senate, and then the duty devolves upon the president of the senate and speaker of the assembly to certify his election to the governor and to the secretary of state, and they to certify his election to the United States Senate. Any other proceeding is out of order and nugatory."

Senator Hudnall stated that he made this statement as a protest and as a point of order. The president held the point of order not well taken and held that Senator Hudnall was out of order in his protest.

The presiding officer then directed the nomination of candidates, and the joint assembly proceeded to vote for a United States Senator. There were 131 votes cast, of which ISAAC STEPHENSON received 65, and the presiding officer announced that "it appears from the records of the convention that no person has received a majority of the votes cast for United States Senator." Whereupon the joint convention dissolved.

On no other day until the 4th of March, 1909, did anyone receive a majority of the votes cast in joint assembly. On that day (the 4th of March) upon the twenty-fourth ballot of the joint assembly there were 123 votes cast, of which ISAAC STEPHENSON received 63. Whereupon the chairman of the joint assembly announced the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON, and the joint assembly adjourned sine die.

At each session of the joint assembly the question as to whether any vote in the joint assembly was necessary was raised by protest against such proceedings upon the grounds that, Mr. STEPHENSON having received a majority of the votes cast in each house voting separately, no other or further duty remained for the joint assembly than that of reading the journals of the two houses of the proceedings in each relative to the election of a United States Senator on the day previous. These journals were read and the fact disclosed that in each house Mr. STEPHENSON had received a majority of all the votes cast. It remained only that "he shall be declared duly elected Senator." The statute does not prescribe who shall declare the person receiving a majority of the votes in each house elected Senator, nor in what form such declaration shall be made.

From the reading of the law it would seem that when the two houses voting separately each gave Mr. STEPHENSON a clear majority and having met in joint session on the day following the vote in the separate houses, the journal of the proceedings of the two houses voting separately being read in joint convention and the result announced, the election was completed; the mere failure to declare him elected could not in any way defeat the will of the two houses as expressed in their separate votes.

The failure to make a specific declaration of his election was not vital. The action of the governor and secretary of state in deferring the certificate of his election or in misstating the time of his election could not affect that election.

If we are correct in assuming that the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON was accomplished when the record of the two houses was read and announced in the joint assembly, then the failure or delay of the executive officers to perform their duty could in no way defeat his election as of the date of the meeting of the first joint assembly.

ACTS OF BRIBERY CHARGED.

Charges of bribery in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's election had been freely made both before the subcommittee and before the legislative investigating committee. Not one of these charges has been sustained by the testimony.

The word "bribery" has been applied to many acts that do not constitute bribery.

The procurement of advertising space or editorial comment in the newspapers upon the payment of money by or on behalf of a candidate for office can not under any construction of law be held to be bribery.

The procurement of the services of men to speak either publicly or personally on behalf of any candidate, or to canvass the electorate on his behalf, is not bribery under any reasonable construction of the law.

If the testimony were true that money was offered to Assemblyman Leuch to go upon the floor and vote for the purpose of effecting a quorum, it would not constitute bribery. It was the duty of such member to go upon the floor and vote.

The charge of an attempt to bribe H. R. Pestalozzi utterly failed of proof before your committee.

The charge of unlawful dealings with the Milwaukee Free Press utterly failed of proof. It was conceded that Mr. STEPHENSON owned a controlling interest in that paper and he was certainly entitled to have its support and to sustain his interest in it.

BRIBERY.

The law of Wisconsin relative (reference is to "Election Laws of Wisconsin," published by J. A. Frear, secretary of state, 1908) to bribery is as follows:

"Sec. 39. Bribery of signers to petitions, etc.: 1. Any person who shall offer, or with knowledge of the same permit any person to offer for his benefit, any bribe to a voter to induce him to sign any nomination paper, * * * and any person who shall accept any such bribe or promise of gain of any kind in the nature of a bribe as consideration for signing the same, whether such bribe or promise of gain in the nature of a bribe be offered or accepted before or after such signing, or any candidate who shall knowingly cause a nomination paper, or papers, to be signed in his behalf by more than the maximum number of qualified electors provided for his district by subdivision 5 of section 11-5 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon trial and conviction thereof be punished by fine of not less than $25 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the county jail of not less than 10 days or more than 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"Penalties: Caucus and general election laws applicable: 2. Any act declared an offense by the general laws of this State concerning caucuses and elections shall also, in like case, be an offense in primaries and shall be punished in the same form and manner as therein provided, and all the penalties and provisions of the law as to such caucuses and elections, except as herein otherwise provided, shall apply in such case with equal force and to the same extent as though fully set forth in this act.

"Sec. 40. General election laws applicable (secs. 11-25): The provisions of the statutes now in force in relation to the holding of elections, the solicitation of voters at the polls, the challenging of voters, the manner of conducting elections, of counting the ballots and making return thereof, and all other kindred subjects, shall apply to all primaries in so far as they are consistent with this act, the intent of this act being to place the primary under the regulation and protection of the laws now in force as to elections.

"Sec. 263. Bribery at elections (sec. 4478): The following persons shall be deemed guilty of bribery at elections:

"1. Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give, or lend, or offer, promise or promise to procure or endeavor to procure any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, or do any such act as aforesaid, corruptly, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

"2. Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give or procure, or agree to give or procure, or offer, promise, or endeavor to procure any office, place of employment, public or private, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce such voter to vote or refrain from voting, or do any such act as aforesaid, corruptly, on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

"3. Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid to or for any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office, or the vote of any voter at any election.

"4. Every person who shall, upon or in consequence of any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement, procure, or engage, promise or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office or the vote of any voter at any election.

"5. Every person who shall advance or pay or cause to be paid any money to or for the use of any other person with the intent that such money or any part thereof shall be expended in bribery at any election, or who shall knowingly pay or cause to be paid any money wholly or in part expended in bribery at any election.

"Penalty: And any person so offending shall be punished by imprisonment in the State prison for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be construed to extend to any money paid or agreed to be paid for or on account of any legal expenses authorized by law and bona fide incurred at or concerning any election.

"Sec. 264 (sec. 4478a). The following persons shall also be deemed guilty of bribery at elections:

"1. Every voter who shall, before or during any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive, agree, or contract for any money, gift, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place of employment, public or private, for himself or for any other person for voting or agreeing to vote or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting at any election.

"2. Every person who shall, after any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, receive any money or valuable consideration on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any election; and any voter or other person so offending shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail not less than one month nor more than one year.

"Sec. 266. "Sec. 294. Bribery at caucus or convention (sec. 4479): Any person being, or seeking to be, a candidate for any office at any election authorized by law who shall give, or promise to give, to any elector or other person any money or thing of value or any pecuniary advantage or benefit for the purpose of inducing or influencing such elector or other person to vote for him in any convention or meeting of the people held for the purpose of nominating any person or persons to be voted for at any such election to make him the nominee of any such convention or meeting and the candidate to be voted for for any office at such election, or who shall so give or promise any such thing to any such person for the purpose of inducing or influencing any person to sign any nomination paper which seeks to have him nominated as a candidate for any office to be so voted for; and any such elector or other person who shall ask, solicit, or receive any money or thing of value or any pecuniary advantage or benefit from such candidate as a consideration or inducement for his vote at any such convention or meeting of the people, or his signature to any such paper, shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year or by fine not exceeding $500.

CHARGES OF CORRUPTION IN THE LEGISLATURE.

On page 2271 of the Report of the State Senate Investigating Committee an attempt is made to summarize the corruption alleged to exist in connection with the election by the legislature, and the first objection is that Mr. STEPHENSON was elected by the legislature by a majority of three votes while the charges of corruption against him were being investigated by the legislature. This charge seems hardly worthy of serious consideration. It was admitted that he was elected by the legislature, and there is no law or rule that would invalidate the election because of the pendency of these charges. That was a matter for the members of the legislature to consider in determining whether or not they would vote for him.

ABSENT MEMBERS ON MARCH 4.

The next charge is that the election of Mr. STEPHENSON was made possible by three members, who, it is claimed, at the instigation of Mr. STEPHENSON's managers and agents, absented themselves from the joint assembly when it became known that their presence would prevent the election of Mr. STEPHENSON, and it was charged that the absence of these three members had been procured by fraudulent or wrongful means by or on behalf of Mr. Stephenson. It was the only charge of corruption in connection with the election of Mr. STEPHENSON by the legislature worthy of consideration.

The result of the vote on March 4 consequent upon the absence of these three members is made plain in the testimony of Richard J. White (p. 1324) and by an examination of the journal of the joint assembly on March 4. On that day the total number of votes cast was 123, of which ISAAC STEPHENSON received 63.

The members of the legislature whose absence from the chamber on March 4 was questioned were Messrs. Farrell, Ramsey, and Towne.

On March 3 Farrell voted for Neal Brown, Ramsey voted for George W. Peck, and Towne did not vote at all.

On March 2 Farrell and Ramsey voted for Neal Brown, and Towne voted for Lucknow.

On March 1 neither Farrell, Ramsey, nor Towne voted at all.

On February 27 Ramsey voted for Wall, Farrell voted for Neal Brown, and Towne did not vote at all.

On February 26 Towne voted for Thomas A. Stewart; neither Farrell nor Ramsey seem to have voted.

These instances are cited to show that on the face of the transaction there was nothing unusual in the absence of either of the three absentees on March 4, and nothing in their absence to raise the presumption of corruption therein.

It is true that had these three members been present and voted the total vote would have been 126, and the 63 votes received by Mr. STEPHENSON would not have elected, but the evidence clearly establishes the fact that Mr. Ramsey, one of the three absentees, was paired with Mr. Fenelon and that such pairs had been universally recognized, so that Mr. Ramsey can not be said to have been absent for any corrupt purpose, nor would his absence from the joint assembly affect the result of the vote. Being paired, he could not have voted. In that event, had Farrell and Towne been present the total vote would have been 125, of which Mr. STEPHENSON received 63. Sixty-three would have been a majority and would have elected Mr. STEPHENSON, so that the absence of Farrell and Towne did not affect the result of the election, and it can not therefore be said that the election was brought about through corrupt practices, so far as the absence of Farrell and Towne was concerned.

It is not charged that any other member who voted for Mr. STEPHENSON did so either from corrupt motives or actions on his own part or that he was procured to do so by any corrupt action on the part of any person in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON.

The votes cast for Mr. STEPHENSON were those that had been consistently supporting him throughout the contest. There was no change in his favor upon which any presumption of corruption could be based.

Does the evidence show or tend to show that there were corrupt measures or unlawful methods adopted to secure the absence of either Farrell or Towne?

There has been much sensational testimony introduced before the subcommittee, which was heard largely because such testimony had been received by the legislative investigating committee for the purpose of showing bribery or corrupt methods in connection with the absence of Ramsey, Farrell, and Towne. It was not shown that any money had been traced to either of these men from any source in connection with the matter; but it was claimed that a fund had been raised to be used for corrupt purposes, and that, on the assumption that such fund had been raised, it must at least in part have been used to bring about the absence of these three members of the legislature.

It was claimed that Senator STEPHENSON had entered into an arrangement with Edward Hines and R. J. Shields for using money for corrupt purposes to be furnished by Mr. STEPHENSON, and much hearsay testimony was introduced for the purpose of establishing such fact. There can be no question but what the effort to establish any such charge utterly failed. There was no evidence upon which any reasonable conclusion that such corruption fund had been either raised or used could be based.

The charge as to a meeting between the three absentees or some of them and Mr. Regan and Mr. Puelicher at the Plankinton House in Milwaukee centered about the testimony taken before the legislative investigating committee of a witness, Frank T. Wagner, who was utterly discredited both at the legislative investigation and by testimony introduced before the subcommittee. It was shown that he is now under sentence in the penitentiary for perjury for having testified to seeing these men in the Plankinton Hotel and hearing a conversation upon which the charge that they had entered into a corrupt bargain at that time rested. All the testimony in regard to such a transaction fell to the ground, and was so manifestly without foundation as to call for no consideration except its dismissal.

CHARGE OF BRIBERY OF OTHER MEMBERS.

There seems to have been some remark on the part of Mr. Damochowski and Mr. Lyons as to the tender of money being made them in connection with this election, but on the witness stand they both stated that whatever statements they made in that regard were made in jest and that there was no foundation in truth for them.

Some sensational testimony was introduced in regard to statements made by Mr. R. J. Shields as to having received money or handled money in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON in a corrupt manner in dealing with members of the legislature, and members of the senate legislative investigating committee had gone to the office of a certain attorney in Chicago and there met Mr. Wirt Cook of Duluth, Minn., who recited to them some hearsay statements as to conversations and acts which were fully investigated by the subcommittee and found to be entirely without foundation.

We may therefore safely dismiss the charges of corruption in connection with the action of the legislature in electing Mr. STEPHENSON, whether such election is held to have been on January 26 or on March 4, 1909.

It appears that Mr. STEPHENSON contributed $2,000 to the Republican State central committee. Against this contribution no legitimate objection can be urged. It was not in violation of any law nor for other than general election purposes.

It was also shown by testimony that Mr. STEPHENSON before the primary gave money to C. C. Wellensgard, Levi H. Bancroft, and Thomas Reynolds, who were candidates for the legislature. These men testified that they used the money in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON at the direct primaries. If we eliminate Mr. STEPHENSON from the direct primaries the contributions which he made to these candidates for nomination and election to the legislature would be in violation of no law. It appears from the testimony that they were at the time voluntary and ardent supporters of Mr. STEPHENSON regardless of any money which they may have received or which may have been placed in their hands by him for any purpose.

There is not sufficient evidence upon which to base a charge of bribery or any other charge that would affect the validity of the election of Mr. STEPHENSON in either of these cases.

DIRECT PRIMARY.

The subcommittee, in determining the scope of the investigation, was confronted with the question as to how far, if at all, the charges affecting the candidacy of ISAAC STEPHENSON before the direct primary should be considered.

The State legislative committee had directed its attention principally to the direct primary and the conduct of the candidates therein.

It was doubtless competent for the legislature to provide for direct primaries for the nomination of candidates for the legislature and to place legal restrictions about them to secure the integrity of their elections, but, as herein elsewhere more fully stated, it is not competent for the legislature to provide for the nomination of candidates for the United States Senate at direct primaries.

The status of Mr. STEPHENSON at such primaries is not comparable to that of candidates for the legislature or for any State office.

The language of the resolution under which the subcommittee acted directs it to report whether "in the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices," and the language of the last paragraph of section 1 of the resolution, bringing the matter to the attention of the United States Senate, strictly construed, refers only to the election.

When we speak of the election of a United States Senator under existing constitutional and legislative provisions we contemplate only the election by the legislature of the State. There is as yet no recognition to be given extra-legislative proceedings in the nature of what is termed "direct primaries," no such method of selection being recognized by any law of the United States.

The subcommittee has, however, brought to the attention of the Senate in the record of its proceedings all the facts obtainable relating to the conduct of the primary. Should it be the judgment of the Senate that such facts are irrelevant, then the consideration would be limited to matters concerning the election of members of the legislature, and the acts and conduct of members of the legislature and candidates in relation to the election of a Senator by the legislature.

The direct primary, legally speaking, is no part of an election of a United States Senator. The duty of an election of a Senator does not rest under any law rest with the electorate, but is vested by the Constitution solely in the legislature. The legislature electing had no existence until after the general election. The nomination of such members at the primary vested in the nominees not even an inchoate status. A State may give force and effect to a direct-primary law providing for the nomination of candidates for State or minor offices to be elected under the laws of the State, but the legislature has no power to regulate in any manner or to any extent the election of a United States Senator, and there is no such proceeding known under any law of the United States as the nomination of a candidate for the United States Senate.

The question arises, Can any act in contravention of a law that is absolutely void work a forfeiture of any right to an office vested through the compliance with the Constitution and laws of the United States? Did the proceedings preceding and at the direct primary relative to a choice for United States Senator amount to more than a "straw vote"?

The mere fact that the Legislature of Wisconsin had undertaken to include a senatorial selection within the provisions of its direct-primary law, in the absence of power to so legislate, could not affect the validity of an election by the legislature made pursuant to national law; this must be obvious from the fact that the legislature was not in duty bound to elect anyone or consider anyone a candidate for election because of the action of the direct primary. It might have ignored such action altogether, and its having done so would not in any way affect the validity of its action.

There is no law of the United States recognizing such a thing as "candidacy" for the United States Senate, and no legal status is given to the frame of mind constituting an intention on the part of a man or his friends that he become a candidate before the legislature.

The question also arises as to the period when a man can be charged with responsibility for his acts so as to affect the validity of his subsequent election by the legislature.

It frequently occurs that none of the men who are avowed candidates are chosen. The matter rests solely with the legislature, and under existing laws one legislature can not dictate the rule governing a subsequent legislature in the manner of its procedure relative to matters resting entirely within its discretion.

It would be entirely within the power of a legislature charged with the responsibility of electing a United States Senator, before proceeding to elect a Senator, to repeal any legislation enacted by a previous legislature which placed a limit upon or directed its action.

It seems from this consideration of the question we must conclude that the direct-primary proceedings can not be held to affect the validity of an election by the legislature.

FAILURE TO FILE PROPER EXPENSE ACCOUNT.

The fifteenth specific charge is based upon the failure or neglect of ISAAC STEPHENSON to make and file an expense account under the laws of Wisconsin. This requirement is under section 270 of the election laws, which provides that every person who shall be a candidate before any convention or at any primary or election to fill an office for which a nomination paper or certificate of nomination may be filed, shall, within 30 days after the election held to fill such office, make out and file with the officer empowered by law to issue the certificate of election to such office or place, a statement in writing, etc., and that any person failing to comply with this section shall be punished by fine of not less than $25 or more than $500. This being a penal statute, the validity of an election could not be affected by the failure to comply with it.

GENERAL COMMENT.

The rule adopted by the several candidates for said office seems to have been unanimous in regard to filing expense accounts. Senator STEPHENSON's expense account was $107,793.05.

S. A. Cook's expense account was $42,293.29.

William H. Hatton's expense account was $26,413.

Francis E. McGovern's expenditure was $11,063.88.

Neal Brown's expense account was $1,075.87.

The total expenditures of all candidates for the office of United States Senator before the primary election was about $225,000.

Less than one-half of the voters at the general election voted at the primary. The total vote cast in the Republican primaries for the nomination of United States Senator was 182,915, being 81 per cent of the total primary vote cast by all political parties for Senator.

The total vote cast in the Democratic Party for United States Senator was 37,479, or about 17 per cent of the total primary vote of all parties cast for Senator, and about 23 per cent of the total Democratic vote cast for governor at the general election.

Mr. STEPHENSON, a Republican candidate, received 56,909 votes.

Mr. Cook, a Republican candidate, received 47,825 votes.

Mr. McGovern, a Republican candidate, received 42,631 votes.

Mr. Hatton, a Republican candidate, received 35,552 votes.

Mr. Brown, a Democratic candidate, received 24,937 votes.

Mr. Hoyt, a Democratic candidate, received 12,227 votes.

Mr. Rummel, Social Democratic candidate, received 4,047 votes.

On the basis of the total vote received by each senatorial candidate and the total cost of each candidate's campaign:

Mr. STEPHENSON spent $1.89 for every vote cast for him.

Mr. Cook spent $0.88 for every vote cast for him.

Mr. Hatton spent $0.85 for every vote cast for him.

Mr. McGovern spent $0.26 for every vote cast for him.

Mr. Brown spent $0.42 for every vote cast for him.

Mr. Hoyt spent $0.16 for every vote cast for him.

And there was spent in behalf of Mr. Rummel, the Socialist Democratic candidate, about $1 per vote.

Were it possible to hold that Mr. STEPHENSON was subject to the same restrictions under the laws of Wisconsin as a candidate for a State office, we would feel compelled to enter more fully upon the nature and character of the expenditures made by him and on his behalf during the primary campaign.

The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatton, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of propriety as to justify the sharpest criticism. Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

Regardless of any statute requiring that strict accounts be kept of money expended by and on behalf of candidates, a candidate and every man representing him should know that public opinion would expect the parties to place and maintain themselves in a position so that if any of their acts were questioned they could justify such acts to the extent of giving every detail in regard thereto.

While I do not believe that the law of Wisconsin could constitute any man a candidate or place him in the position of and under the responsibilities of a candidate for an office over which the State had no control and which was not to be filled under any law of the State, yet I feel impelled to criticize the acts of those in charge of the expenditure of the money of men who are called candidates for the Senate, and especially of Mr. STEPHENSON, in the irresponsible and reckless manner in which they disbursed the money furnished them by Mr. STEPHENSON during the period of the primary campaign.

The failure to keep detailed accounts, the destruction of memoranda, the shifting of records and papers concerning the campaign from one place to another, the adoption of mysterious methods and roundabout ways in regard to matters that might just as well have been performed in open daylight in the presence of the people, would go far toward creating the impression that there was some occasion for Mr. STEPHENSON's representatives to avoid candor and to obscure conditions.

The subcommittee has gone carefully through all of the letters and correspondence which had been in the hands of Mr. STEPHENSON and his managers and which had been shifted from Milwaukee to Marinette and from Marinette to points in Michigan, and back again, under most unusual and mysterious circumstances. These letters are not out of the ordinary political correspondence of campaign managers and citizens whose votes, influence, or services are solicited in behalf of a candidate.

The letters transmitting and acknowledging the receipt of money have been considered separately from those giving information in regard to political conditions and instructions in regard to how political work shall be done. There is nothing in the letters transmitting or acknowledging the receipt of money that would seem to add anything to the information given by witnesses in explaining these expenditures so far as they could explain them. The subcommittee has not thought it necessary to print this correspondence, which is in evidence and might be held to constitute a part of the record of the investigation. In our judgment, it would add nothing in the way of assistance to the committee in ascertaining the facts necessary and proper to be considered in connection with the investigation.

Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON, and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate, were conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

The joint senatorial primary investigating committee in its report (submitted Mar. 18, 1910, but never acted upon), after reviewing the testimony, says:

"Your committee believes that the Republican senatorial candidates and their managers did not deliberately plan to violate the law, but in their desire to win these candidates, particularly STEPHENSON, Cook, and Hatton, conducted their campaigns with the idea of getting results, and men were hired and money spent, and State officials and employees and members of the legislature were used without much regard to propriety. All of the Republican candidates probably spent all they could afford, and the amount spent by the different candidates was probably limited more by their ability to spend than their appreciation of the moral effect of the expenditure of such large sums of money to secure the nomination."

This committee evidently looked upon the result of the direct primary, as shown by the vote cast therein for each of the men who sought election to the United States, as constituting a legal nomination. I entertain a different view of that matter and look upon the primary nomination as a mere expression of a choice without legal effect, and do not recognize such expression as binding upon the legislature.

CONCLUSION.

The testimony clearly shows that the candidates felt compelled to spend more money than they wanted to spend. The pressure upon them from those who were undertaking to manage their campaigns seems to have been very great and persistent, but I can find nothing in the testimony nor in the circumstances or conditions surrounding the senatorial contest which resulted in the election of Mr. STEPHENSON that in my judgment would justify the committee in recommending that the seat be vacated, or that he be declared not legally elected to the United States Senate; and therefore I recommend that the Senate find that the charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, are not true, and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be acquitted of such charges.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, quicken, we beseech Thee, every noble impulse, every high ideal, every holy aspiration within us that with patriotic zeal and religious fervor "we may render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's," in whatsoever our hands findeth to do this day. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20182.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20182, the chemical schedule, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20182, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that before adjournment yesterday evening the agreement was that general debate should continue for one hour this morning, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consume his time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I agreed to yield all my time this morning to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], but I do not see him here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I can occupy five minutes' time and I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN].

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to introduce to the members of the committee here an object lesson on the full dinner pail that they may have the same for their inspection— [Placing large illustration on Clerk's desk.]

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, that is a speech without words. [Laughter and applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. I can see the force of that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to consume his time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the extent to which the Government should go in the regulation and control of our great industrial corporations is one of the most important questions of the hour.

If further control shall be deemed advisable, then we can not exercise too much care or wisdom in adopting plans, in selecting means, and in choosing administrative machinery to accomplish the purpose we have in view.

Since the passage of the so-called Sherman Antitrust Act, July 2, 1890—22 years ago—we have not added a single line to our laws that materially increases, extends, or enlarges the actual control of the National Government over industrial corporations.

In the meantime, there has been a revolution in this country—an industrial, business, and commercial revolution that is felt in every section of our country and in every home in the land. We have passed through a period of industrial concentration. The size of our corporations have grown until they have attained proportions beyond the grasp and comprehension of the human mind.

There is evidence that some of these corporations have the power—if they wish to exercise it—to arbitrarily control the prices of articles in common use among the people.

If any one corporation, or any number of corporations have this power, then we should proceed with unflinching firmness and determination to enact such laws as will wrest this power from them.

This is a most dangerous power, utterly subversive of the rights and liberties of the people, and under no circumstances should it be allowed to exist.

When our forefathers ordained our Constitution, every precaution was taken to guard the political and property rights of the people. These rights were regarded not only as sacred to every freeman, but absolutely essential to the welfare of the people, and the perpetuity of the Republic; for no free people would maintain a government that did not safeguard and protect both political and property rights.

The Constitution does not protect property rights if, under it, corporations may arbitrarily dictate what the people shall pay for articles in common use.

When we have reasonable evidence that corporations have attained such domination in the production and sale of articles in common use that they have eliminated free and effective competition—repealed, as it were, the great economical law of supply and demand—and are able at their pleasure to put prices up or put them down, then we should proceed to eradicate this evil, and if necessary to accomplish our object we should bring into requisition every power of the National Government.

The people have a right to know, not only that they are not being robbed, but that it is not within the power of any of our great corporations to rob them.

We are expending $215,000,000 annually to maintain our military establishment. We are constantly expending millions of dollars annually in strengthening our naval equipment. But we are not engaged in war; we do not expect war.

This vast expenditure is largely a precautionary measure. May we not, with even greater propriety, as a precautionary measure, expend a few hundred thousand dollars annually to protect our people from the possibility of being compelled to pay unjust tribute to our overgrown corporations?

I do not regard House bill 18711 as radical legislation. I would not magnify existing evils. It is not my purpose to unduly alarm the people over either real or imaginary dangers. I have no desire to create prejudice against the great business institutions of this country. In so far as they are legitimate and lawful, I take just pride in their splendid achievements. I honor the men who direct our great industrial concerns in the contest for supremacy in the markets of the world. I would offer them every encouragement, and by national legislation aid them in their contest for world supremacy. But it matters not how legitimate and lawful a corporation may be, we must still place around it all the restrictions, limitations, restraint, and control that are necessary to guard the State and protect society.

For only in such restrictions, limitations, restraint, and control can we give our industries permanent prosperity and our people proper protection.

PROVISIONS OF H. R. 18711.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the important provisions of H. R. 18711, which I introduced January 25, 1912. By permission of the House I desire to print this bill in full as a part of my remarks. (See Appendix "A.") The purpose of this bill is to provide a practical and effective method by which the National Government may exercise proper and effective control over our great industrial corporations.

Important provisions of H. R. 18711 may be summarized as follows:

First. The bill creates "the interstate corporation commission," composed of seven members. The commission is given jurisdiction over industrial corporations similar to the jurisdiction the Interstate Commerce Commission has over railway corporations. Only corporations whose annual receipts exceed $5,000,000 are subject to the provisions of the bill.

Second. It declares that the price or prices at which any corporation subject to the provisions of the act shall sell or dispose of any article of merchandise or any product whatsoever shall be just, fair, and reasonable.

Third. It provides—that every practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any corporation subject to the provisions of the act in conducting its business, or in the management, control, regulation, promotion, or extension thereof, shall be just, fair, and reasonable, and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare.

Fourth. It provides that every corporation subject to the provisions of the act shall deal justly and fairly with competitors and the public, and that it shall be unlawful for any such corporation—to grant to any person or persons any special privilege or advantage which shall be unjust and unfair to others or unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or to enter into any special contract, agreement, or arrangement with any person or persons which shall be unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or which shall give to such person or persons an unfair and unjust advantage over others, or that shall give to the people of any locality or section of the country any unfair, unjust, or unreasonable advantage over the people of any other locality or section of the country, or that shall be contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare.

Fifth. It gives the commission the authority on complaint, or on its own initiative without complaint—to determine and prescribe what shall be a just, fair, and reasonable price to be charged for such article of merchandise or product, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged until further order of the commission, and to determine and prescribe what practice, method, means, or system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance is just, fair, and reasonable, and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that such corporation shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the commission finds the same to exist, and such corporation shall not thereafter charge or collect or accept for such article of merchandise or product a price in excess of the maximum price so prescribed, and shall adopt, conform to, and observe the practice, method, means, policy, and system so prescribed, and cease to use any device, scheme, or contrivance that is contrary to any of the provisions of this act.

Sixth. It authorizes and empowers the commission to make rules and regulations not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, to aid in the administration and enforcement of the act, and by such rules and regulations to prohibit any particular or specific act or acts, practice, method, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance that is contrary to any provisions of the act.

Seventh. It provides practice and procedure for the enforcement of rights before the commission and the courts, gives the commission ample authority to enforce its orders and exercise strict supervision and control over corporations subject to the provisions of the act.

THE BILL IN A SENTENCE.

In a sentence, this bill creates the interstate corporation commission; places industrial corporations with gross annual receipts in excess of $5,000,000 under its supervision and control; and by law creates what might be termed a new code of business ethics, which requires corporations subject to the provisions of the act to dispose of their products at just and reasonable prices; to give like privileges and advantages to all, and, in conducting their business, not to engage in any practice or method that is unfair, unjust, or unreasonable, or that shall be against public policy or dangerous to the public welfare.

AUTHORITY TO MAKE RULES AND REGULATIONS.

One of the important provisions of the bill is the authority given the commission to make rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of the act and by such rules and regulations to prohibit any act or acts, practice, method, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance that is contrary to any of the provisions of the act.

The bill does not prohibit specific practices or business methods which are generally regarded as illegitimate, but promulgates general rules of conduct comprehensive enough to exclude every illegitimate act or method.

Under the authority given it, the commission may by rule or order prohibit any specific act or practice that is not in harmony with the general rules of conduct promulgated by the act of Congress.

The advantages in this arrangement are apparent. Congress might pass an act to-day which prohibits all the known iniquitous and dangerous devices and schemes to which corporation managers have heretofore resorted. Unscrupulous corporations may cease to use such practices so condemned by act of Congress, but they may invent new schemes which may be worse than those made unlawful by Congress. Congress acts with much deliberation. While waiting for congressional action, the corporations continue to engage in methods which enable them to destroy competition and inflict untold injury upon the public. The commission could act quickly. When any new scheme, device, or method was invented by the corporations which was in conflict with the principles of business ethics enunciated by Congress, the commission could promptly make an order prohibiting such practice or method.

CONTROLLING PRICES.

I am aware that there will be strenuous objection to the provisions of this bill which give the commission any power to regulate the prices of products, even of corporations possessing monopolistic power. The country may not have reached the point when it is ready to take this step. In my judgment this step is necessary, and we will never attain best results until the National Government does assume some authority over prices.

I do not believe that it would be practical for the Government to control or fix prices generally. Such a thing, if practical, is not contemplated by the provisions of this act. I desire distinctly to express myself as opposed to such a proposition. I do not think the National Government should go into the business generally of fixing prices of products. Free, open, honest competition must continue to be the great factor in controlling and regulating prices. We must do our utmost to promote and preserve competition.

The provisions of this bill are intended to affect only corporations which have attained enormous size—a size which justifies a belief that they possess monopolistic power. In my judgment there is nothing impractical, nothing revolutionary, nothing dangerous to society, to the State, or to the people for the National Government to exercise such control over such corporations as will require them to dispose of their products at reasonable prices.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. With pleasure, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that during the French Revolution repeated attempts were made by law to regulate the price of cereals and that it absolutely failed?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know that I am familiar with that fact, but even if that were true I do not think it would demonstrate that under twentieth-century conditions we could not now exercise certain control over prices of large corporations that have a practical monopoly.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will yield further, does he believe that the Government can regulate prices?

Mr. MORGAN. I do to a certain extent.

Mr. MURDOCK. By a commission?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman, in the comprehensive proposition which he has planned, make provision for individual complaint and challenge of prices to the commission, or does he expect the commission automatically to regulate the prices?

Mr. MORGAN. As I shall show further, Mr. Chairman, in my remarks, my view of it generally is that the Federal Government, the State, or a municipality should have the power to file the complaint against monopolistic prices, but the provisions of my bill give the commission the authority on its own initiative to investigate prices and determine whether or not they are just and reasonable.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I simply want to suggest, while we are commenting upon the inquiry of my friend from Kansas, that during the time of the French Revolution the effort was not to regulate the price of cereals, but the price of bread.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say the cereals were the material out of which bread was made, by the way. And the gentleman will remember that the attempt absolutely failed?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, certainly. They hanged a few bankers to lamp posts on account of the price of bread.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the day will never come under the flag of this country when anyone will be hanged to lamp posts on account of high price or the cost of bread, and it is because I believe the people have some ground for complaint, on account of monopolistic control of prices, that I am advocating that the Government should extend its strong arm around the people to protect them and make them secure from monopolistic prices.

AID TO SHERMAN ANTITRUST LAW.

The provisions of this bill do not conflict with the provisions of the so-called Sherman antitrust law. Its purpose is to strengthen this act and aid in its enforcement. But the scope of the bill is broader than the Sherman Antitrust Act. That act seeks to prevent and destroy monopoly. This bill seeks to prevent, destroy, and control monopoly. The Government should do its utmost to destroy every private monopoly, trade and commerce should be kept absolutely free from monopolistic control, and competition should be preserved. But if we can not prevent, if we can not destroy, then we should control. This bill assumes that under existing conditions and under modern methods we may do our best and still monopolies may exist, and that if monopoly does exist it is the duty of the Government to control it.

In matters of health we seek to prevent disease; but when disease exists, and we can not promptly destroy it, we strive to keep it under control. We do not allow the malady to go on indefinitely, slowly but surely sapping the life and vitality of the patient.

In like manner we should treat our industrial system, now infected with a malignant monopolistic fever. In spite of our efforts to prevent and destroy, the malady has grown more virulent. We have not been able to cure or destroy this fever. Let us act the part of a wise physician—continue our efforts to destroy the disease, but in the meantime apply some remedy that will keep it under control.

IN LINE WITH EXISTING POLICY.

The bill is in line with the existing policy of the Government. We have already entered upon the policy of national control. Twenty-five years ago we passed the "Act to regulate commerce." Twenty-two years ago we passed what is known as the Sherman antitrust law. Nine years ago we created the Bureau of Corporations and armed it with the weapon of publicity. Through these laws we are now exercising important control over both transportation companies and industrial corporations. Under the Sherman antitrust law we dissolve corporations. We dictate the terms and conditions on which they may do business. Under the same law, individuals have been indicted, prosecuted, fined, and imprisoned.

I am not asking for a new policy. I am asking for an advance movement.

The face of the National Government has been looking in the right direction, but its progress in the line of regulation and control has not kept pace with the growth of monopolistic power in our industrial system. I am not asking the Government to change front, but I am asking that its speed be accelerated and its momentum be intensified. [Applause.]

IN HARMONY WITH POLITICAL PLATFORMS.

The provisions of the bill are in harmony with the repeated platform declarations of both of the great political parties.

Beginning with 1884, and on down to 1908, every four years, both the great political parties have placed in their platforms declarations in favor of regulating and controlling the great industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

The Republican platform of 1900, on which William McKinley was elected President, condemned all conspiracies and combinations intended to restrict business, to create monopolies, to limit production, or to control prices, and specifically declared for such legislation as will effectively restrain and prevent all such abuses, protect and promote competition, and secure the rights of producers, laborers, and all engaged in industry and commerce.

The Republican platform of 1908 declared that the act of July 2, 1890, should be strengthened by such amendment as will—give the Federal Government greater supervision and control over, and greater publicity in, the management of that class of corporations engaged in interstate commerce having power and opportunity to effect monopolies.

The Democratic platform of 1908, declared for "such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States" and, among remedies, declared for a Federal license system and for a law compelling licensed corporations "to sell to all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms, after making allowance for the cost of transportation."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman recollect that the same Democratic national platform that he refers to tried to define a monopoly by stating that any corporation or concern which controlled over 50 per cent of a given product should be called a monopoly?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, I want to ask the gentleman, who has gone into this matter thoroughly and who is giving voice here in this speech to a modern doctrine—that is, the control of corporations by a governmental commission—if he has attempted to give a definition of monopoly? What does he call a monopoly?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not an expert in definitions. I could not offhand give a definition that would be satisfactory to the gentleman or myself.

Mr. MURDOCK. What does the gentleman regard as a monopoly? A predominant control of any given article?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think this—that if a corporation has such domination and control over a certain line of business that it has power to arbitrarily control prices, then I regard that as such a monopoly as should come under the control of the National Government.

Mr. MURDOCK. Whether it would control 50 per cent of the product or not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. Now, my Democratic friends, here is a declaration of the Democratic Party in its national convention in 1908 which absolutely declared in favor of controlling prices, because if you go so far as to control prices by saying in effect that products shall be sold everywhere at the same price, then you have adopted the principle of control of prices.

It is not my business to advise the Democrats of this House what to do. You are in the majority. You control the legislation that passes this House. The people will hold you responsible for your acts. If you go back to the people with your promises and pledges unfulfilled you will be condemned at the polls and the scepter of power in this House will be returned to the Republicans. [Applause on the Republican side.]

For one I would like to see Republican platform pledges imprinted upon the pages of our national statutes. I would like to see Republican convention promises embodied in the laws of the Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would like to see Republican political declarations transformed into rules of action that are binding alike upon our captains of industry and the people. I would like to see a brighter age come to our Nation and all its citizens, and I believe that legislation along the lines indicated in our Republican platforms will hasten a better and brighter day for all.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if his plan of control of prices extends only to the products of monopolies, or does he intend that it shall extend to all commodities in the country?

Mr. MORGAN. Only to the products of monopolies.

Mr. JACKSON. Then what plan does the gentleman propose for determining what shall be a monopoly?

Mr. MORGAN. This bill provides that its provisions shall apply to corporations whose gross annual receipts are in excess of $5,000,000. That might be increased to $10,000,000, as the House, on its investigation, might determine. Again, it might be increased to $20,000,000 or it might be reduced to $1,000,000.

Mr. JACKSON. Does not the gentleman fear a constitutional trouble there, that the proposed plan of controlling prices might be considered to be the taking of property without due process of law, unless it was left to some court to determine what constitutes a monopoly and what does not?

Mr. MORGAN. I think this commission would be a quasi-court to pass on that question, and then the corporations would have the right of appeal to the courts.

Mr. JACKSON. I have read the gentleman's bill, I will say, and I find much in it to approve. But does not the gentleman apprehend that he would find some difficulty in putting upon one body both judicial and legislative power?

Mr. MORGAN. Does not the Interstate Commerce Commission have both judicial and legislative power? It may now fix the rates of the railways.

Mr. JACKSON. I think not. I think the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission are wholly legislative.

Mr. MORGAN. I think not. They can render judgments. They have the right now to render a judgment declaring that a certain charge or rate is unreasonable, and fixing the rate that the corporation shall charge.

Mr. MURDOCK. And there might be an appeal from the commission to the court?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; there would be an appeal.

Mr. JACKSON. I think if the gentleman will consult the Atlantic Seaboard case he will find that the power of the commission in fixing a rate to apply in the future must be legislative, and that the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission are exercised always subject to the power of the courts to declare that any rate fixed by them is in the nature of taking property without due process of law.

Mr. MORGAN. I think under this bill corporation would have the same power of appeal to the courts as they have under any decision or order made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. JACKSON. What I am coming to is this: That any scheme of control which fails to recognize the fact that the business control must first be passed upon and determined by some court would be unconstitutional, would be termed a taking of property without due process of law. Now, if the gentleman will permit me just a second further, to refer to something that has been alluded to here as having occurred in the French Revolution, I want to say that the Board of Trade of London exercises practically this power to control prices at the present day, and in at least one case in this country has the control of the price of bread been sustained by the courts in the State of Florida.

VIEWPOINT OF THE PEOPLE.

Mr. MORGAN. About three-fourths of my constituents are farmers; about one-fourth reside in the towns and cities.

The farmers are not fully satisfied with existing conditions. Some way they feel that the prices they receive for farm products and the prices they pay for merchandise they buy are in a measure, controlled by the arbitrary manipulation of great corporations.

The people of the towns and cities—the mechanics and laboring men of all kinds, the bankers, merchants, clerks, and professional men—are complaining of the high cost of living, but do not fully understand who, if anybody, is responsible or how relief may be secured. The people in the cities do not complain of the prices the farmers receive for their products, but they believe the middlemen in some way reap too great profit.

But the people everywhere are reasonable and fair. They seek, they ask, they demand, they want nothing but what is reasonable and just. They feel that they have a right to know that corporations are not imposing upon them by exacting unjust profits. If there be unrest, it is because the people feel insecure. In my opinion, the only way to quiet this unrest, to allay this feeling of insecurity, is to throw around the people an impregnable fortress of national laws that will guarantee to them safety, security, and protection.

A great, nonpartisan interstate corporation commission, equipped with proper machinery, armed with modern legal weapons, backed by all the power of this great Government, will do much to satisfy the people, subdue discontent, quiet the unrest, and relieve the feeling of insecurity which now exists among the good people of the United States.

IN HARMONY WITH PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

This measure responds to existing public sentiment throughout the country, and meets the demands of the people. The people of the United States, regardless of party affiliation, demand that there shall be some legislation along this line.

There is a prevalent belief that competition is no longer the controlling factor in fixing prices of many products. This belief is supported by substantial evidence. Competition does not prevail as it did in former years. Many believe that under the Sherman antitrust law the Government will never be able to restore competition to such an extent that consumers will be fully protected. As years go by our wealth will grow, our population will increase, our business and commerce will expand, and with all this our corporations will naturally grow in size and financial strength.

I do not believe competition as a factor in controlling prices should be or ever will be eliminated. We will continue to have competition, both potential and actual. Under no circumstances should we surrender this mighty agency as a factor in our industrial system.

We must, however, meet conditions as they exist. Where competition has been eliminated we must provide a substitute; where competition is inadequate or ineffective we must supplement its power with governmental control. Control is the only substitute for competition. Control must begin where competition ceases.

Let us keep the fire of competition burning brightly and brilliantly in every industry and in every section of our country; but should the flame of competition in any industry grow dim, or should it, under stress of monopolistic power, become extinct, let us not leave the people in darkness and despair. Let us have a great commission and place in its hand the blazing torch of authority to reinforce competition, to perpetuate its life, and preserve its power and potency in our industrial system.

WITHIN CONSTITUTIONAL POWER.

The provisions of this bill are, in my judgment, within the constitutional power of Congress.

The Supreme Court has upheld the act of Congress regulating and controlling the railway corporations engaged in interstate commerce. It has upheld the provisions of the so-called Sherman Antitrust Act. If Congress may declare that the rates and charges of railways, express, telegraph, and telephone companies shall be reasonable and just, under the same authority Congress may declare that industrial corporations engaged in interstate business shall dispose of their products at reasonable and just prices. If Congress may control railway corporations in their practices it may also control the practices of great industrial corporations.

I know that railway corporations are regarded as natural monopolies. I know that in the eye of the law railway companies are quasi-public corporations. But may not Congress by legislative enactment declare certain industrial corporations quasi-public corporations? Why can not Congress, within its constitutional power, declare that a corporation having so much capital or controlling a certain per cent of the products in a given line of business or doing annually a certain amount of business shall thereby become a public agency and a quasi-public corporation?

But we need not rely solely on the clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the authority "to regulate commerce among the several States and foreign countries." There is another provision that gives Congress the authority "to provide for the general welfare."

Under modern business methods and under twentieth-century conditions industrial corporations have attained such size and financial strength that they become a menace to the public welfare if they are left unbridled, uncontrolled, and unrestrained.

As Representatives in Congress, under the Constitution we are the guardians of the public welfare. We should use to the very limit our constitutional power to protect the fundamental rights of the people and safeguard the public welfare.

Finally, if it shall be determined that Congress has not the constitutional power to fully and completely protect the people, then, at the earliest date possible, our Constitution should be amended so as to give our National Legislature ample power to afford to all the people all proper protection against all monopolistic corporations.

CONTEST WITH THE RAILROADS.

Twenty-five years ago a great controversy was in progress in this country. The parties engaged in the contest were the people and the railroads. The time had come when it must be decided who was supreme, the people or the railroads. Congress, reflecting the sentiment of the people, created the Interstate Commerce Commission. In the act creating the commission Congress also promulgated three fundamental rules of conduct which the railroads were required to obey. These cardinal rules required of the railroads, first, that they should give to the public reasonable and just rates; second, that they should give to individuals and localities equality of rates; and, third, they should give to all impartial privileges and facilities.

Congress in enunciating these rules pointed the managers of our railways to a more excellent way, gave them a chart for their guidance, and set up for their observance a higher standard of business morality.

In this "act to regulate commerce" Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission as an instrument of warfare, as a weapon in battle, as a great fighting machine in the mighty struggle in progress between the people and the great railway corporations.

The railway companies defied the law and denied the authority of the commission. They resisted to the last every effort of the Government to control their rates or restrict their management.

But the Government gained ground. The commission was given additional power. Greater restrictions were thrown around the railroads. The corporations fortified position after position, but at every stand were compelled to yield. A general retreat was ordered, and soon followed the final surrender. Today, 25 years after this great controversy began in earnest, the great railway corporations acknowledge the supremacy of the law and submit to the authority of the National Government.

The act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," is one of the most important measures ever passed by the Congress of the United States.

Before its enactment the great transportation companies of this country had it in their power to levy annually upon the people of the United States millions of dollars of unjust tribute. They could, with perfect impunity, give special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and other preferences which would enrich one man and impoverish another. There was not a syllable of law that regulated the rates or controlled the practices or restrained the acts of our great railways in their interstate business. The railway managers were absolute in their power, supreme in their authority.

All this has been changed. The people are now supreme. They are free from railway domination. They are masters of the railways, not their subjects.

So much has been accomplished through the "act to regulate commerce" in emancipating the people from the rule and domination of railway corporations, in freeing them from the payment of unjust tribute levied by these great transportation companies, that we may fitly denominate this great statute as the second Declaration of Independence.

A SECOND GREAT STRUGGLE.

The people of the United States are now in a second great struggle. Their antagonist at this time is our great industrial corporations. These gigantic organizations are strongly entrenched. They have untold wealth. They have unlimited resources. They have able leadership. They have the confidence which comes from many victories already won. They are equipped in every way to make a long, stubborn, and effective fight. These great corporations will not recede, they will not retreat, they will not willingly surrender a single advantage they enjoy. The interests of 90,000,000 people are at stake. In this great crisis the country turns to the National Legislative Assembly. Let us not disappoint the people in their expectations. Let us give them the same instrument of warfare, the same weapon in battle, the same fighting machine, that they used so successfully and effectively in their contest with the great railway corporations. Let us create a great interstate corporation commission, clothe it with ample power and jurisdiction, and direct it to proceed forthwith to bring our gigantic industrial corporations into subjection. To guide these great business institutions in conducting their business let us proclaim by legislative enactment that their prices must be reasonable and just; that all must be given like privileges and advantages; and that the National Government will not tolerate practices or methods in business that are unfair, unjust, or unreasonable, or that are against public policy or dangerous to the public welfare.

By so doing we will have promulgated a higher law for the guidance of our gigantic industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce; we will have set in motion the governmental machinery that will be able to cope with these great corporations; and we will have put the people and the corporations upon a highway that will lead them to reconciliation and unite them in an effort to bring to our country a reign of industrial peace, which is essential to our industrial prosperity. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

A bill (H. R. 18711) to regulate the commerce of certain corporations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That every corporation engaged in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, not subject to the provisions of the act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and acts supplementary and amendatory thereof, and whose gross annual receipts or the total annual gross receipts of whose subsidiary companies for the calendar year 1911 were, or for any calendar year thereafter shall be, in excess of $5,000,000 shall be subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That every corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or that may hereafter become subject to the provisions of this act, is hereby declared to be a quasi public agency.

SEC. 3. That the price or prices at which any corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall sell or dispose of any article of merchandise, or any product whatsoever, shall be just, fair, and reasonable, and it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to sell or dispose of any article of merchandise, or any product whatsoever, at a price or at prices that are unjust, unfair, or unreasonable, and every corporation subject to the provisions of this act is hereby prohibited from so doing.

SEC. 4. SEC. 6. That whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made to the commission hereinafter created, or after full hearing under an order for investigation and hearing made by the said commission on its own initiative, the commission shall be of opinion that any price or prices whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act for any article of merchandise or product, or that any practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any such corporation in conducting its business, or in the management, control, regulation, promotion, or extension thereof, is unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial or contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be a just, fair, and reasonable price to be charged for such article of merchandise or product, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged until further order of the commission, and to determine and prescribe what practice, method, means, or system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance is just, fair, and reasonable, and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that such corporation shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the commission finds the same to exist, and such corporation shall not thereafter charge or collect or accept for such article of merchandise or product a price in excess of the maximum price so prescribed, and shall adopt, conform to, and observe the practice, method, means, policy, and system so prescribed, and cease to use any device, scheme, or contrivance prohibited by the order of the commission.

All orders of the said commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than 30 days, and shall continue in force for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the commission, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the commission, or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 7. That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the interstate corporation commission, which shall be composed of seven commissioners, and the said interstate corporation commission is referred to hereinafter as "the commission."

SEC. 8. That on the taking effect of this act the Bureau of Corporations shall cease to exist and shall be merged into and become a part of the commission, and the person who at that time shall be the Commissioner of Corporations shall become a member of the commission and continue as such for a period of two years, and said person shall also for a period of one year be the chairman of the commission, at the expiration of which time, and annually thereafter, the commission shall elect a chairman; and the Deputy Commissioner of Corporations shall become one of said commission, and shall hold his office for a period of one year. The commission shall appoint a secretary of the commission, who shall hold his office at the pleasure of the commission, and all the clerks and employees in the Bureau of Corporations shall become clerks and employees of the commission, and all the duties and powers of the Bureau of Corporations are hereby transferred to, granted, and bestowed upon the commission, and any funds belonging to said Bureau of Corporations which by law are authorized to be expended by said bureau are hereby transferred to the commission, which is hereby authorized and empowered to expend the same.

SEC. 9. That the commission shall consist of seven members, not more than four of whom shall be of the same political party. Except as hereinafter provided, the members of the commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the first appointees shall hold their positions for periods of three, four, five, six, and seven years, respectively; and in making such appointments the President shall designate the length of terms of such appointees, and thereafter the members of said commission shall be appointed for a term of seven years. The members of the commission shall each receive a salary of $7,500 per annum, and the secretary of the commission shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. In case of vacancy the appointment shall be for the unexpired term of the member whose retirement from the commission caused the vacancy.

Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. No person in the employ of or holding any official relation to any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or owning stocks or bonds thereof, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of or hold such office. Said commissioner shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment.

No vacancy in the commission shall impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to make and establish rules and regulations, not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, to aid in the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act, and may, by such rules and regulations, prohibit any particular or specific act or acts, practice, method, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance that is contrary to any of the provisions of this act.

That the decisions of the commission shall be final as to the facts, and in all cases of appeal from any decision of the commission the court shall have jurisdiction to pass only upon questions of law and to determine whether or not the commission acted within the scope of its authority, or whether or not the decision in effect confiscates property or takes the same without due process of law.

SEC. 10. That in case any corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall do, cause to be done, or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such corporation shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for double the amount of damages sustained in consequence of any such violation of the provisions of this act, together with a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court in every case of recovery, which attorney's fee should be taxed and collected as a part of the costs in the case.

SEC. 11. That any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act may either make complaint to the commission, as provided in this act, or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such corporation shall be liable under the provisions of this act in the Commerce Court; but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt.

In any such action brought for the recovery of damages the court before which the same shall be pending may compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of such corporation defendant in such suit to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

SEC. 12. That any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, who, alone or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, shall willfully do or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States, be subject to a fine not to exceed $5,000 for each offense, and, in the discretion of the court, may be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years.

SEC. 13. That the commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted and shall have the right to obtain from such corporation full and complete information necessary to enable the commission to perform the duties and carry out the object for which it was created; and the commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act.

And upon the request of the commission, it shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the commission may apply to institute in the proper court and prosecute under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecutions shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

SEC. 14. That any person, firm, corporation, company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society or other organization, or any body politic or municipal corporation, complaining of any act done or omitted to be done by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, in contravention of the provisions of this act, may apply to the commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the complaint thus made shall be forwarded by the commission to such corporation, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint, or to answer the same in writing, within a reasonable time, to be specified by the commission. If such corporation, within the time specified, shall make reparation for the injury alleged to have been done, it shall be relieved of liability to the complainant only for the particular violation of the law thus complained of. If such corporation shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, or there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating said complaint, it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the matter complained of in such a manner and by such means as it shall deem proper.

The commission shall have full authority and power at any time to institute an inquiry on its own motion, in any case and as to any matter or thing concerning which a complaint is authorized to be made, to or before said commission by any provision of this act, or concerning which any question may arise under any of the provisions of this act or relating to the enforcement of any of the provisions of this act. And the said commission shall have the same power and authority to proceed with any inquiry instituted on its own motion as though it had been appealed to by complaint or petition under any of the provisions of this act, including the power to make and enforce any order or orders in the case, or relating to the matter or thing concerning which the inquiry is had, excepting orders for the payment of money. No complaint shall at any time be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the complainant.

SEC. 15. That the commission is hereby given authority on its own initiative to institute and conduct an investigation to determine whether or not any corporation subject to the provisions of this act was organized in violation of the provisions of the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or is doing business in violation of the provisions of said act, and if, after investigation, the commission shall conclude that any such corporation was organized in violation of the provisions of said act, or is doing business in violation of the provisions of said act, the commission may issue an order citing such corporation to appear and answer to the charge in such matter; and if on final hearing the commission shall find that such corporation was organized in violation of the provisions of said act, it shall make an order providing for the dissolution of such corporation; and if the commission shall find that any such corporation is doing business in violation of any of the provisions of said act, it shall make such order or orders as will prevent the further violation of said act on the part of such corporation; and thereafter such corporation so found to have been organized in violation of the provisions of said act, or so found to be doing business in violation of said act, shall cease to engage in interstate commerce except upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the commission.

SEC. 16. That the following sections and provisions hereinafter mentioned, in so far as they are applicable and are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended to and put in force in all matters relating to or pertaining to the commission herein created and to every corporation subject to the provisions of this act, and the power, authority, and duties conferred by the sections and provisions hereinafter mentioned upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as the same are applicable, are hereby conferred upon the commission created by this act, and the duties, liabilities, and rights conferred upon common carriers by such sections and provisions are hereby conferred upon every corporation subject to the provisions of this act, and the rights, privileges, and liabilities conferred upon any person or persons, firm, corporation, association, or locality by such sections and provisions are hereby conferred upon any such person or persons, firm, corporation, association, or locality, namely, sections 12, 13, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the act approved June 18, 1910, entitled "An act to create a Commerce Court, and to amend the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes."

SEC. 17. That this act shall take effect and be in force 60 days after its passage.

REPORT OF THE EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 338).

The SPEAKER laid before the House of Representatives a message from the President of the United States, which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[For message see Senate proceedings of to-day.]

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to consume the balance of the time on this side of the House, and I desire to have the Clerk read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid the rates of duty which are prescribed in the paragraphs of this act upon the articles hereinafter enumerated, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), and the said paragraphs and sections shall constitute and be a substitute for paragraphs 1 to 83, inclusive, of section 1 and of section 25 of section 2982 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 21 of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to cure a technical error in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words, after the word "five," in line 12, page 1:

"Of section 2982 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 21."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in referring to the section that is amended a mistake was made in the reference.

The section amended in this bill is section 25 of the Payne Act, and this amendment properly recites the section that is amended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be agreed to. In fact, if the gentleman from Alabama would offer some other amendments, such as I have suggested, they would make the bill very much better than it was originally drafted. I am glad to know that he has met the first suggestion I made in regard to the imperfections of the bill by offering an amendment to cure one imperfection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DUTIABLE LIST.

1. Acids: Benzoic acid, 5 cents per pound; boracic acid, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound; citric acid, 3 cents per pound; formic acid, 1½ cents per pound; gallic acid, 4 cents per pound; lactic acid, 1½ cents per pound; oxalic acid, 1½ cents per pound; phosphoric acid, 2 cents per pound; phthalic acid, 5 cents per pound; pyrogallol acid, 6 cents per pound; salicylic acid, 2½ cents per pound; tannic acid and tannin, 4 cents per pound; tartaric acid, 3 cents per pound; all other acids not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 7, by striking out the following words "Benzoic acid, 5 cents per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, benzoic acid is now on the free list. This bill proposes to put it on the dutiable list at 5 cents a pound. Salicylic acid is now on the dutiable list at 5 cents a pound, and this bill proposes to reduce the duty on salicylic acid to 2½ cents a pound. In a way these two acids are competing articles. The bill reverses the present policy, which is for the interest of the industries, and proposes to put an exorbitant duty on benzoic acid and to reduce the duty on salicylic acid.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken in believing that benzoic acid and salicylic acid are competing products. Benzoic acid is a coal-tar derivative which we have put upon the tax list, and it is used for the most part for the purpose of making benzoate of soda, which has fallen into great disfavor in the administration of the pure-food law. Three-quarters of the benzoic acid is probably used for that purpose. The other quarter is used chiefly for the purpose of making saccharin, a product which has likewise fallen into public disfavor, and of which it is intended in the future entirely to prohibit the use.

Salicylic acid, on the other hand, is a very widely used article in the manufacture of many beneficial medicines, and we have cut in two the rate on salicylic acid, both as a revenue measure and having in mind the purposes for which salicylic acid is used. It is used not only for medicine, but also in the manufacture of certain coal-tar dyes and colors, and we believe that by putting benzoic acid on the tax list and cutting in two the tax on salicylic acid we have brought about a more equitable rate of taxation. The use of salicylic acid for a preservative has been forbidden, so that benzoate of soda and salicylic acid can not be said to compete with one another in any sense.

Mr. MANN. They are both preservatives and used as such.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The use of both of them has been forbidden by the pure-food law, and those are only subsidiary uses.

Mr. MANN. Their use has not been forbidden by the pure-food law. That matter is an open question, and they are both in use now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 13, by striking out the words "phthalic acid, 5 cents per pound."

Mr. BARTHOLOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the effect of this bill will be in other sections of the country, but it certainly seems as if Missouri had been singled out for special punishment by the Democratic majority in this House; and the shots of the tariff tinkers are not popgun shots but broadsides, annihilating whole industries in which the people of Missouri excel and from which they draw a great part of their sustenance.

In the first bill containing the metal schedules the lead and zinc industries of Missouri were stricken down, and this bill proposes to strike down the barytes industry of southeast Missouri and the great chemical-manufacturing industries of St. Louis.

Though Missouri at the last three elections returned majorities in favor of the party of protection, there are only 3 of us on this floor out of 16, owing to an artful gerrymander, ready to defend the interests and industries of Missouri against these Democratic assaults. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I wonder if my 13 Democratic colleagues will allow the ruthless destruction of the industries in their own State as contemplated in this bill. The people of my State have hardly had time to examine the schedules or to be heard from regarding them, but I hold in my hand a letter from the head of a chemical company which will give the Members of the House an idea of what the verdict of the people will be with respect to this bill. The writer is a Democrat, as far as I know, and has struggled hard, even under the present rates, to build up the business—against foreign competition—of which he is the head. In doing so he and his associates have gone so far as to deny to themselves the salaries to which they were justly entitled. I ask the Clerk to read this letter, which relates, among other things, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, February 17, 1912.

HON. RICHARD BARTHOLOTT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BARTHOLOTT: I am in receipt of a copy of the bill which proposes to reduce duties on chemical products. This bill, if enacted into law, means nothing more nor less than disaster to the greater part of the chemical industry of this country, and as for us, it would put us completely out of business.

We have an investment here of about $250,000; our sales last year were in excess of $400,000, and to produce the goods which made up this amount we paid for wages and salaries close to $100,000.

Every industry must be prepared more or less for possible changes in the tariff, but it is hard to believe that any Congressman sent to Washington for the express purpose of safeguarding the interests of his constituents can be so absolutely devoid of knowledge of the industrial conditions, or so fanatic in his belief in theoretical principles, as to intentionally wipe off the map of the United States industries which have been established against great odds, and which promise to make the people of this country more and more independent of foreign supplies.

The direct result of the passing of such a bill as now proposed will mean the cutting off of the means of subsistence of thousands of wage earners, both of the laboring and of the professional class, throwing them on the streets with no prospects in sight for new employment.

As I have told you before, the chemical manufacturing industry, and more particularly the organic line, is in its infancy in this country and needs governmental support in order to grow. Look at Germany and its tremendous growth in chemical manufacture, and more particularly within the last 10 to 20 years. Why? Because of the constant and practical encouragement and protection received at the hands of the German Government.

To show you how this bill will work on us if enacted into law, I desire to call your attention to a few of the numerous instances of unexplainable conditions.

In paragraph 1 the duty proposed on phthalic acid is 5 cents per pound, equal to about 20 per cent of its value, and in paragraph 5 it is proposed to reduce the duty on the medicinal product in which it is used to 15 per cent, thus making the duty 20 per cent on the raw material and 15 per cent on the finished product.

Where is the logic in such legislation? Are we to support and foster foreign industry?

The note at the bottom of page 2 states that phthalic acid is used in the manufacture of coal-tar dyes. This is not correct, especially not when applied to this country where a great bulk of this raw material is used in the manufacture of medicinal products.

In the same paragraph a duty of 2 cents per pound is proposed on phosphoric acid, equal to about 25 per cent of the value when applied to the quality we use, i. e., 45° Baumé, and with conditions as to the finished medicinal product similar to that above stated.

Paragraph 15 proposes to assess a duty of 75 cents per pound on caffeine with the statement that the equivalent ad valorem (per cent) is 41.25, while, as a matter of fact, it is 23.80, the correct value of caffeine being both here and abroad $3.15 per pound, and not $1.82 per pound, the average unit chosen as basis. As against this, a duty of 1 cent per pound is proposed on the raw material—tea waste, tea siftings, etc.—which is equivalent to 40 per cent of the actual value. Therefore we have a duty of 23.8, or about 25 per cent, on the finished goods with a duty of 40 per cent on the raw material.

Paragraph 18. Chemical and medicinal compounds and preparations containing alcohol, if enacted into law, would stop the manufacture of a number of medicinal products in the United States, particularly chloral hydrate, which product is now manufactured here against great odds on account of the favorable position German manufacturers occupy both as to chlorine and alcohol, the chief raw materials for its production.

Paragraph 41 proposes to assess a duty on cloves of 2 cents per pound, equal to about 20 per cent of their value, while the duty on vanilla, which is made from cloves, suffers a reduction of from 20 cents per ounce to 10 cents per ounce, or 50 per cent reduction.

In paragraph 23 it proposes to assess a duty of 5 per cent, and in paragraph 24 10 per cent, on coal-tar products, such as benzol, toluol, etc., which heretofore have been on the free list, and which products are essential raw materials for all chemical manufactures.

You can readily see from the foregoing how impossible it would be for chemical manufacture to exist under such conditions, and for the life of me I can not see what is to be gained by such a bill, excepting the intentional destruction of chemical manufacture in the United States.

I will be pleased to have a line from you in reply to the foregoing, with such suggestions as you can offer as to how this bill should be combated.

With the assurance of my high esteem, I beg to remain

Yours, very truly,

JOHN F. QUEENEY, President.

(During the reading of the letter the time of the gentleman from Missouri expired, and by unanimous consent it was extended sufficiently to finish reading the letter.)

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment to strike out from the dutiable list phthalic acid at 5 cents per pound. Phthalic acid, as I understand it, is used in the manufacture of certain chemical compounds. These chemical compounds are put on the dutiable list at the rate of 15 per cent ad valorem. Phthalic acid at a specific duty of 5 cents a pound, as proposed by the bill, would amount to an ad valorem duty of about 20 per cent ad valorem, so it is proposed to change from the free list to the dutiable list a basic article at the rate of 20 per cent to be used in the manufacture of a protected article that is to bear 15 per cent. There is no excuse for transferring this item from the free list to the dutiable list, and much less excuse for making an ad valorem rate on what is, in a sense, a raw material, higher than the rate on the finished product.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has been misled by some of the inaccurate statements of the letter which the gentleman from Missouri had read at the desk. Phthalic acid, which we take from the free list and tax at 5 cents a pound, is not used for medicinal preparations, but exclusively used in the manufacture of very high-priced, high-grade coal dyes and colors.

In the general rearrangement of the coal-tar color schedule it was found advisable to take this one of the ingredients of high-priced products and put it on the taxable list at 5 cents a pound.

As to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois about our having taxed a basic material at a higher ad valorem rate than the product into the manufacture of which it enters, he is mistaken, because it does not enter into the manufacture of the articles carried in paragraph 5, which is the basket clause of this bill covering medicinal compounds, which we have reduced from 25 per cent ad valorem to 15 per cent ad valorem.

But even suppose it did enter into these manufactures, phthalic acid at 5 cents a pound bears an ad valorem equivalent of 18.75, and suppose it was used in the manufacture of medicinal compounds now in the basket clause, the ad valorem rate on the highly finished product would soon overtake and outstrip the ad valorem of the basic material and allow a handsome manufacturer's margin.

I make this explanation simply to show that the conclusions of the gentleman from Illinois, admitting his premises, are incorrect; but as a matter of fact his premises are incorrect, because phthalic acid is not used in making medicinal compounds.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I presume that neither the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] nor myself can personally state what phthalic acid is used for. He gets his information from one source. I get my information from a manufacturing chemist who uses the article. I prefer to believe the statement of the people who make use of the article in manufacturing a compound rather than the statement of any theorist, whoever he may be. The situation, however, illustrates the need of having a tariff board to give us accurate information in reference to these matters before we endeavor to enact tariff legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, this question of putting free raw materials on the dutiable list was fully considered by the committee three years ago. The bill under consideration is a direct departure from former practice. I call attention to page 8 of the report, where I find the following:

In effecting the changes the committee has had in mind only the necessity for raising the revenue required from this schedule, holding in view the interests of the consumer.

On page 17 of the same report it states frankly that the question of the ultimate consumer has not been considered, but the interest of what they call the manufacturer. Mr. Chairman, I distrust the Greeks when they come bearing gifts. I paraphrase that by saying, "Keep your eye on a free trader when he talks protection to you"; I do not believe in it. This same question came before us three years ago, and the great chemists of the country said in the public hearings which seem to be objectionable now:

If you will give us an advance of 5 per cent on the finished products of coal tar we will develop that industry in this country, provided you leave the first derivatives or raw materials for our products on the free list.

We decided to do that and raised the duty from 30 per cent to 35 per cent. The bill went over to the Senate, and the Senate put the duty back to 30 per cent, but left the raw materials on the free list.

This bill not only cuts the 30 per cent duty down to 25 per cent, but it makes the raw materials dutiable. What does that do? It absolutely surrenders the chemical industry of this country to German combinations and trusts. The gentleman from New York smiles. He must stand by his own witness, and I bring to him now the testimony of his own witness, sitting by his side on the floor of the House, to prove absolutely what I say. If the gentleman will kindly turn to pages 5 and 6 of the report, he will find the following:

As shown elsewhere 4,068 patents were issued in the United States between 1900 and 1910, relating to chemicals and allied industries; at least 3,500 are applicable exclusively to chemicals as such. Of these, a large number relate to inventions in organic chemistry, among which carbon dyes and carbon compounds constitute a considerable percentage. While about 38 per cent of the 4,068 patents were granted to Americans, about 2,500, or 62 per cent, were granted to foreign inventors.

A patent is essentially a monopoly, and the fact that the United States does not specify compulsory working of patents but allows the production of the article wherever desired, permitting importation subject only to the tariff, means that, under present conditions, practical control of a considerable portion of our market for chemicals is accorded to foreign inventors and producers entirely independent of costs of production.

I now ask gentlemen present who have it to turn to pages 361 and 362 of the summary furnished by the Tariff Board:

Of the 1,754 patents issued for German inventions, 1,247, or a little over 71 per cent, related to carbon dyes and compounds and bleaching and dyeing processes, in all only 5 subdivisions out of more than 40 accounted for in the table. The number of the assigned inventions was 1,111 out of 1,247, or practically 90 per cent—

And I want every Member, and you gentlemen who denounce the trusts, you people who are instituting investigations of the trusts, to understand precisely now what you are voting for, that you are voting not only to cripple an American industry, but absolutely to turn it over to a German combination, authorized by the German Government; and here is your own testimony—and of these, as is shown by the table below, 844 inventions, or 68 per cent, were assigned to only four companies, who in connection with one other company by an interchange of stock and division of profits under an agreement to last 50 years from 1904, work on a "community of interest" plan, as revealed by their own reports.

Here are the names of the concerns:

Aktiengesellschaft für Farben, Berlin.
Badische Anilin Fabrik.
Bayer & Co.
Farbenfabrik Elberfeld.
Meister Lucius & Bruening.

When I say to you that one of these concerns employs 7,700 people and 217 research chemists, and that they control 90 per cent of all of these patents, and that you are absolutely turning this industry over to these four companies, you will understand what I am trying to prove to you. The witness on the other side says this:

A patent is essentially a monopoly, maintained with the consent and enforced with the help of the Government. Its prime object and recognized social value consists in promoting the material development of industry in the country of issue. Viewed from this point it seems that the development of the chemical industry in the United States has not kept pace with the number of patents issued. Our patent laws are stringent as to novelty and lenient to the inventor or his assignees. They practically certify the first and give far-reaching protection to the latter, much more protection than in any other country, because the American law recognizes the patentability of the product as such, so that no other process or improvement thereof can touch it during the life of the patent in the United States except with the consent of the original inventor or his assignees.

In the chemical industry, however, the product is of paramount importance. Contrary also to the requirements of the patent laws of most other industrial countries, the United States does not specify compulsory working of the patent issued, but permits the patentee and him only to import his products into the United States from whatever place he chooses, giving him a monopoly of the market without imposing upon him any obligation or demanding of him any equivalent except the minimum fee paid originally to the Patent Office. In the case of the American inventor, such importation will develop only under exceptional circumstances; with the foreigner, however, it is for obvious reasons the rule, in the chemical industry especially. The American market is the most valuable in the world, and the foreign inventor or his foreign assignees naturally take all the advantage that the law gives them to exploit this market as profitably as they can. This very largely accounts for the tardiness with which the chemical industry develops in the United States, especially in those branches which depend preponderantly upon inventions and therefore can not be gauged by any tariff legislation under the theory of cost equalization or under any other theory.

In 1907 England found herself in an utterly intolerable situation in regard to this. Here is what your witness said:

Up to 1907 the English patent laws did not require compulsory working in England of patents issued there, but the situation became so unbearable that the law was changed and the compulsory working feature established, with the result that, according to a report in the London Times, up to 1911, 50 foreign firms had begun or were about to begin manufacturing in England, involving an investment of about $4,000,000 and the employment of nearly 7,000 wage earners, with a weekly pay roll of $40,000.

So that whatever else may be the result of this legislation, it is an absolutely sure fact, found by experience, that you are deliberately turning over to the great consolidated German chemical industry, maintained and recognized as a trust by the Government, with a 50-year agreement, 46 years yet to run, the control of this industry in the United States. Now, why do you do it? Three years ago you were opposed to it, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said this in the hearings on this very subject:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You would increase the cost of the raw material by putting a duty on the coal-tar products, would you not?

Mr. PENNOCK. Naturally.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And to that extent it would retard their manufacture and the ability of the American manufacturers to compete with foreign manufacturers of chemical products.

It was simply a question of whether we should leave the raw material free or not, and my friend from Alabama sided with us on that proposition and said that the effect of putting these on the dutiable list would be to embarrass the American manufacturers. Let me tell you again what he said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. I would like five minutes more, if agreeable; if not I will not trespass upon the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. UNDERWOOD said to the witness:

If we put a duty on your by-product, would not that to that extent retard the chemical manufacturers of this country by increasing the cost of their material?

That was his view then.

I call your attention now to pages 379 and 380 of the glossary of the Tariff Board. Let me read you some more, and I am reading the history of the German chemical industry as published by the Tariff Board:

Practically all the important manufactures of the chemical industries and many products of lesser importance are under some form of syndicate control, more or less strict, and more or less extensive as to production, prices, supply of raw materials or division of territory. Chemical manufacturers lend themselves more readily to consolidation than any other because within a given line the products from one source are not visibly different from those of other sources and, on the same basis of purity, do not differ at all. The products therefore carry little if any individuality, which is the principal basis of competition. Quite a number of these organizations are bound by agreements of some kind to international "cartels," the object of which is to control the international markets.

We made an honest attempt, gentlemen, three years ago to relieve the United States from the conditions in which both England and the United States found themselves. England did it by changing her patent laws. She did not think she could change her tariff laws in order to do it. We did it by changing our tariff laws, giving 5 per cent more protection on the finished product and leaving the raw material on the free list. Now the Democratic Party proposes to cut down the duties on the finished product, put a duty on the raw material, and in five years—yes, in three years—the chemical industry will find itself here in the same position that the English industry found itself when England said that it was unbearable and intolerable. The only possible remedy for us is to hold the present schedule of the tariff law and make it compulsory upon German manufacturers to come here in the country of sale, and produce in this market, with American labor at American wages, as Mr. Pennock said in the hearing three years ago that he could if we left the rates as they were then. It is a perfectly unparalleled proposition that the Democratic Party should take $42,000,000 of importations, free under the list of last year, and transfer them all by one single act to the dutiable list. What will the result be? Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to show you. A statement appeared in the papers the other day that this bill was a reduction in the rate of duty of 31½ per cent ad valorem. Will you kindly oblige me by turning to the summary at the end of the dutiable list?

It is on page 158 of the caucus print of the bill, for that is the real legislation which we are now getting. It shows that Congress has abdicated legislative power so far as the action of the House and Senate is concerned. We are told it is absolutely useless to offer an amendment on this floor unless it comes from the committee. But the statement was made, and I have no doubt made in good faith, that there was a total schedule reduction of 31½ per cent ad valorem by this bill. If you will turn to page 158 you will find two sets of imports.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] have 10 minutes more in which to finish his remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Thank you. When I received the courtesy of an advance copy of the bill, the day before it was introduced, from the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee, I began to study the summary. That gave me the whole story in a nutshell. I found that the imports under Schedule A last year were $48,000,000. I found the estimates for the next year were $96,000,000, and I wondered how the importations could increase more than double from one year to another. Then I read on and found that $42,000,000 of free products had been transferred to the dutiable list. But how did the committee get a rate of 25.72, the ad valorem of the Payne bill, which was compared by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] with 16.64, the ad valorem under the proposed estimate? In my ignorance and inability to comprehend that situation I made inquiries and learned this fact: That the upper row of figures on page 158 covers the same items all the way through that are shown in $96,742,850 under the estimate. And then I wondered, if that was true, why they had not figured out the ad valorem for those years as well as the ad valorem for 1912—estimated. I went to work and figured it out, and what do you suppose I found? I found that where they estimated an ad valorem of 16.64 for the coming year under their bill on identically the same items under the Payne bill the ad valorem was 14 per cent, 2.64 less than their own; in 1910 it was 13.65 and theirs was 16.64 on the same items. Now, was it fair to compare an estimated ad valorem for 1912 with a half of the same things under the Payne law in 1911? Was it fair to leave out the ad valorems and leave the page blank when they did figure on the same items? Instead of being a reduction of 31½ per cent it is an increase of 20 per cent over the Payne law, as any man can see who figures it. How was that increase arrived at? By taking free raw materials off the free list under the Payne bill and making them dutiable, lowering the average of the whole schedule, and then saying that this was less than the rate of the Payne bill, because they had given the Payne bill no credit whatever for the free raw material coming in last year under that law to the amount of $42,000,000.

There is another thing on that page which shows a rather startling situation. If you will take the lower row of imports, you will see that the ad valorem under the Dingley law was

28.52, and yet Democratic testimony shows right alongside of it that the Payne bill was reduced to 26.41 the first year following and to 25.72 the second year. So they not only prove that they have raised this 20 per cent, but they have proved that the Payne bill lowered the Dingley law very materially. And they have proved more than that. They have proved that they have absolutely put back the average rate under their estimates of this bill to 16.64, which is precisely the rate of 1905, according to their own showing, under the Dingley law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So as it stands to-day, the estimated ad valorem here is the exact equivalent of the Dingley law in the year which they cite themselves—16.64.

That is not all. What have you gained, gentlemen, by all this legislation? You have given us a chemical schedule, a metal schedule, a wool schedule, and a cotton schedule. Under your own figures, the correctness of which I dispute, because they ought to be larger, you estimated $10,500,000 loss of revenue on the free-list bill when you would have had $50,000,000 loss of revenue under it. You estimated no increase of importation when you would have had an enormous increase. But, taking your own figures and convicting you out of your own mouths, this is the total of the estimates up to this present time. How are you going to get the increase under the chemical schedule? Are your figures right? Absolutely not. I came in just a moment ago, and I inquired of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] how you had amended the first section of your bill, and he told me.

You have got to-day things on the free list that you dream you are going to get revenue out of. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] You offered an amendment to correct this, and your amendment has been absolutely of no benefit whatever to you, and those things will still remain on the free list under the Payne law. Under the amendments which you offered yourselves in committee you attempted to remove a lot of oils from your original free-list text and put them under the general basket clause in the dutiable-oil paragraph. They do not go there. That basket clause covers only things that are not otherwise specified, and every one of those oils is specified in the free list in the Payne law. When you get your legislation through, if you ever do [laughter and applause on the Republican side], you will find you are in a hole on your estimates of revenue, even on your own estimates.

What are your total estimates to date on the bills presented? You increase importations of the value of $3,899,151 on the chemical schedule. You increase on the metal schedule $24,815,801. On the wool schedule you increase $63,831,000. These are your own figures. On the cotton schedule you increase importations $10,746,358. In other words, if your legislation should be successful you would have displaced thus far $103,000,000 of American products and turned them over to the factories of Europe.

Now, what have you gained by it? Have you gained revenue? Absolutely no. On the contrary, you have lost, according to your own estimates, on the metal schedule, $823,597; on the wool schedule, $1,348,349; on the cotton schedule, $3,074,801; and you have possibly gained on the chemical schedule $3,095,549. The net loss in revenue, in order to turn over the making of more than one hundred millions of American products to foreign factories, has been $12,180,187, according to your own estimates. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why do you do it? Along on the 20th day of last December this message came to Congress. There is no reason why you should not act intelligently. I do not mean by that any personal reflection on any member of the committee. I mean that there is no reason why you should not act with full knowledge before you. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut desire to withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I will withdraw that now. I will make another one directly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. Albumen, blood, 2 cents per pound; egg albumen, 6 cents per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, lines 21 and 22, by striking out the words "egg albumen, 6 cents per pound," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "egg albumen, 3 cents per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that is to strike out the increase proposed in the bill of the tariff on egg albumen, which is now 3 cents a pound. This restores it to the rate fixed in the existing law. The bill proposes to increase the rate of duty 100 per cent. It is unjustifiable, in my opinion.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, paragraph 4 of the Underwood bill is taken from the agricultural schedule of the Payne law and a reduction from 3 cents a pound to 2 cents a pound is made in blood albumen, which is used in dyeing and in printing textiles, and an increase from 3 cents a pound to 6 cents a pound is made in egg albumen, which is used about half in making photographic films and half in making baking powder. The raise was made as a revenue proposition, the increase in revenue under the raised rate showing from $27,000 to $46,000.

Now, as to the use of egg albumen in making baking powder, about 4 ounces of this material are used in making 100 pounds of baking powder. It is believed that the Baking Powder Trust can stand this additional taxation upon their material of manufacture. But I will call the attention of the committee at the same time to the fact that, as I said yesterday, we have reduced the rate on alum, which enters into the making of most baking powders, from 37 per cent to 15 per cent; and on bicarbonate of soda, which comprises about a quarter of the bulk of baking powder, we have reduced the tariff taxation from three-quarters of a cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent a pound; and on cream of tartar we have cut the duty from 3 cents a pound to 2½ cents a pound, which I think leaves the trade in a favorable condition and materially increases the revenue. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. Alkalies, alkaloids, and all chemical and medicinal compounds, preparations, mixtures and salts, and combinations thereof not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me entirely unnecessary to consider this bill at this time, and in confirmation I will read to our Democratic friends a recommendation which is a little old, but which is good. I am going to read from the message of the President on the 20th of December, 1911, transmitting to Congress the findings of the Tariff Board on the wool schedule. There is no necessity for taking up this bill. The Tariff Board have made no report upon it. I say that advisedly. They have made no report upon it. Any assistance that has been given has been given by individuals, and nobody will claim anything to the contrary. No authorized assistance by the Tariff Board, upon which they are willing to stand; not a word or a line of it outside of the glossary has been given up to this moment, and no investigation of this schedule has been made, and none of the metal or wool schedules had been made at the time they were brought in; but an authorized report on the wool schedule has come in since, and this is what the President said when he sent it in:

In my message of August 17, 1911, accompanying the veto of the wool bill, I said that, in my judgment, Schedule K should be revised and the rates reduced. My veto was based on the ground that, since the Tariff Board would make, in December, a detailed report on wool and wool manufactures, with special reference to the relation of the existing rates of duties to relative costs here and abroad, public policy and a fair regard to the interests of the producers and the manufacturers on the one hand and of the consumers on the other demanded that legislation should not be hastily enacted in the absence of such information; that I was not myself possessed at that time of adequate knowledge of the facts to determine whether or not the proposed act was in accord with my pledge to support a fair and reasonable protective policy; that such legislation might prove only temporary and inflict upon a great industry the evils of continued uncertainty.

I now herewith submit a report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K. The board is unanimous in its findings. On the basis of these findings I now recommend that the Congress proceed to a consideration of this schedule with a view to its revision and a general reduction of its rates.

The findings of fact by the board show ample reason for the revision downward of Schedule K in accord with the protective principle, and present the data as to relative costs and prices from which may be determined what rates will fairly equalize the difference in production costs. I recommend that such revision be proceeded with at once.

Two months have gone by since that recommendation was made. Are you honest in your desire to have a revision downward of any portion of the Payne bill? The President invites you to it. The Republican Party invites you to it. You are playing politics, and you are now sending to him, with the same ideas that characterized your action in the last session, of "putting him in a hole," schedules which have not been reported on by the Tariff Board. For two months you have had that report before you. In 10 days you will have a report on the cotton schedule. Why do you not bring in a woolen bill based on that report? If you want to find the difference in cost of production and then put your revenue tariff below it, we will offer you a substitute based on the Tariff Board report. Then let both bills lie before the House for a week, in order that the Members of this body need not go into a caucus and be called upon to pass a binding vote on a bill which they have never seen—187 pages of it—which they have never read. It was under those circumstances that the chemical bill was passed through the caucus last week without amendment, almost without discussion—a bill which never had even been read by the Members who voted upon it. We will meet you with a wool bill based on the report of the Tariff Board. Let both bills lie on the table for a week and then take them up for intelligent consideration and let every Representative here vote his honest convictions. Will you do it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I just want to say this—

Mr. HILL. I will not ask any further extension at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing that the other side of the House should have full opportunity to discuss this bill and offer amendments to it, but I do insist that the discussion shall be confined to the bill and the paragraphs before the House.

Now, I do not like to object, and I would not if the gentleman is willing to discuss the bill. I would like to answer the gentleman's argument. Within 60 days we will report a wool bill in this House and pass it, and the gentleman from Connecticut will vote against it. [Laughter.] I do not want to inject that question into this discussion. If the gentleman is willing to discuss the bill I will not object to extending the time.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Alabama can not separate the method of passing a bill from the policy in it. It is not a question of rates here now; it is a question of policy—will the United States have a revenue tariff or will it have a protective tariff? That is all there is to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman, in all fairness, that the time for discussing the policy was when the bill was up for general debate. Mr. Chairman, I will give notice that all other speeches on the bill must be confined to five minutes.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is not the one to decide whether remarks are on a particular paragraph of the bill or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that all other remarks on the amendments must be confined to five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am one of those on this side of the House who thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the discussion on this bill should be short, sharp, and decisive. There is no other way. This matter ought to be settled at once and the country ought to be relieved of the agony as soon as possible. Men who are engaged in the chemical business, paint manufacturers, manufacturers of aniline dyes, and other chemicals that enter into the manufacture of clothing and other commodities, and the people who use these articles ought to know just as soon as possible what the majority in this House proposes to do to them.

I am one of those who have been hearing from home, from men engaged in large industries, who have been writing and wiring about this bill. They had no opportunity to be heard by the committee which framed the bill. They desired to be heard because their business interests were at stake. Now, Mr. Chairman, they come appealing at this last moment to their Representatives on this side of the House to explain the situation to the country. They desire the consumers of these products to understand what it means for a Democratic majority to impose the tariff duties on raw materials, thus changing the entire policy of the party. It is their belief that the consumer—the farmer of the land—may pay more for paint and varnish than he has been paying heretofore. If gentlemen on the other side want to enact this bill and impose this penalty on the men who till the soil, upon those who buy the paints and live in the frame farmhouses where paints are most used and needed, let us have it known as quickly as possible. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, this is about all I want to say at this time. I speak for a large and interested constituency, and, in view of the brief allowance of time, ask permission to extend my remarks in the Record, to include certain telegrams, letters, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks leave to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. Alizarin, natural or artificial, and dyes derived from alizarin or from anthracene, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 3 by striking out lines 3 and 4, which read as follows:

"6. Alizarin, natural or artificial, and dyes derived from alizarin or from anthracene, 10 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this article is now on the free list. It is necessary in the preparation of dyes. It is proposed to put it on the dutiable list at 10 per cent ad valorem. It is not a competitive article, and it ought to remain on the free list, in my opinion.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail. He has stated the fact correctly that this article has been removed from the free list and put on the dutiable list at 10 per cent ad valorem. It is purely a revenue proposition. We expect to get $65,000 in duties by placing a tax on alizarin. At the same time, it is only fair to say that eventually it is probable that both alizarin and indigoes in which the synthetic manufactures have already displaced the natural product will themselves be replaced by other coal-tar derivatives. So as a revenue proposition it is probable that it will operate to our advantage only for a few years. At the same time, it would be utterly inconsistent for us in rearranging the coal-tar color schedule to leave the highly finished product on the free list and tax the raw material. As we have the matter arranged, coal tar is on the free list, and the derivatives, creosote and anthracene oil, are on the dutiable list at 5 per cent.

The next highest products which I am unable personally to pronounce are taxed at 10 per cent, the next at 15, and the next at 25 per cent, which is a reduction in the rates of 30 per cent, as stated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. In this connection I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut that I do not suffer from the charge of inconsistency which he made, because three years ago I moved to place back upon the tax list these same unpronounceable subjects upon the statement which was correct then and is correct now, that they are not raw materials, but are intermediate products; in other words, they are halfway finished products, and should bear their just proportion of taxation.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Why does the gentleman change his mind now and put them on the dutiable list, when three years ago he was in favor of putting them on the free list?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman misunderstands me. Three years ago I was in favor of taking them off the free list and putting them on the dutiable list, and I made some remarks upon the subject in the House at that time.

Mr. HILL. Oh, I understood the gentleman to state just the other way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in line with the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] a moment ago, and in order to save time, I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] in hereafter prefacing his remarks in opposition to amendments offered on this side of the House that he omit the words "I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to," because the gentleman knows that it can not pass. He knows that no amendment offered by anyone except a member of the committee can pass, because the Democratic caucus has so decreed. Therefore, in the interest of saving time, I suggest that he omit those words. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman from Ohio has admitted that he is without hope. He is gradually realizing that he is in the minority.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. That is what makes him wild.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 48, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would not thrust myself into this debate but for the fact that I am able to do so with less trepidation than I have heretofore experienced when other bills emanating from the Committee on Ways and Means were before this House, and because also of the fact that what I do not know about this bill would fill several volumes. I have less trepidation in addressing myself to this paragraph for another reason, namely, that I have had time to hear from Colorado, where the women vote, and therefore necessarily have commensurately more knowledge about things in general than have women who come from States where equal suffrage is not allowed. Mr. Chairman, I have heard no complaint from home that the tax on peroxide has been reduced only 10 per cent in this bill. Of course, in Colorado, where the women are so beautiful, they do not need to use it, and they are so intelligent they condemn the use of it anywhere as it was formerly another argument in favor of women who enjoy equal suffrage. [Applause.] But I want to say that there is another use to which peroxide is put—of course, unknown to the committee. Being honored by a membership in the National Stock Growers' Association, I want to say that this committee has favored us stock growers in this bill, because peroxide is used in beautifying our horses by bleaching their tails and manes, thus adding 25 per cent to the value of a chestnut horse just as soon as the peroxide is applied. [Laughter.] Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Committee on Ways and Means on account of this reduction as well as rebuke them for not putting peroxide upon the free list, because I tremble for my Democratic friends from other States when it filters through the brains of their women folks that they have been so neglectful of their duty as to put any tax whatever upon that necessary chemical. [Applause and laughter.]

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. Alumina, hydrate of, or refined bauxite; alum, alum cake, patent alum, sulphate of alumina, and aluminous cake, and all other manufactured compounds of alumina, not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CATLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As the effect of the tariff decrease in this section will be to bring about a cessation of the manufacture of a great many of the articles now produced by the chemical companies of this country, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter I have received from the head of one of the largest chemical works of this country, and situated in the district which I have the honor to represent. This letter explains some of the effects the bill will have upon the chemical productions of the country, and I ask that the Clerk read it, omitting the extraneous passages which I have erased.

The Clerk read as follows:

MALLINCKRODT CHEMICAL WORKS,
St. Louis, February 17, 1912.

HON. THERON CATLIN,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR THERON: We are manufacturing a large line (some 500 items) of medicinal, photographic, and other fine chemicals, and the present duty on the products, with a few exceptions, is covered by the 25 per cent ad valorem schedule. If you will compare this rate of duty with the rate imposed on the products of textile, iron, and other industries you will find that the rate is comparatively small. Considering that in the other larger industries production is mostly through machinery, while our products are the result of handwork by skilled laborers and chemists, the unjust discrimination against us will become apparent, and it is a fact that the importation of German chemicals has been steadily increasing for a number of years and that American manufacturers find it difficult, even with a 25 per cent ad valorem duty, to compete. The higher cost of not only labor but of most materials, and all things that enter into the making up of a manufacturing plant more than offsets the 25 per cent ad valorem. Every article of machinery, porcelain, stoneware, etc., which we import pays a duty of 50 to 75 per cent, and these articles are left unchanged in the present Underwood bill. If the ad valorem duty of 25 per cent on chemicals is reduced to 15 per cent, as contemplated under section 7 of the Underwood bill, we shall have to discontinue the manufacture of a large number of articles and become importers.

Section 8 reduces the duty on ammonium carbonate from 1½ cents to 2 cents per pound and anhydrous ammonia from 5 cents per pound to 2½ cents per pound. The present duty on ammonium carbonate is barely sufficient protection, and large quantities of the English article are imported. A duty of only 2½ cents per pound on anhydrous ammonia will give the foreign manufacturers an opportunity to compete successfully in this country with American manufacturers.

Section 16 reduces the ad valorem duty on calomel and other mercurials, from 35 per cent to 15 per cent ad valorem. As the duty on mercury, from which these preparations are made, is 7 cents per pound, the change would result in turning the market over to the foreign manufacturers.

Strychnine and salts now pay a duty of 15 cents per ounce and are placed on the free list. This action would certainly give the foreign manufacturers the advantage over Americans. Why this article, which is so difficult to manufacture, should be singled out for such unwarranted treatment I am unable to understand. The duty on strychnine, in my recollection, has been successively reduced under the different tariff revisions from $1 per ounce to 15 cents under the Payne-Aldrich bill and the latter protection is certainly disproportionate to the protection afforded other and much more important articles.

I shall be obliged to you for any efforts you may make in our behalf, and with best regards, remain

Very sincerely, yours,

EDWARD MALLINCKRODT.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

9. Argols or crude tartar or wine lees crude or partly refined, containing not more than 90 per cent of potassium bitartrate, 10 per cent ad valorem; containing more than 90 per cent of potassium bitartrate, cream of tartar, and Rochelle salts or tartrate of soda and potassa, 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, lines 14, 15, and 16, by striking out the words "argols or crude tartar or wine lees crude or partly refined, containing not more than 90 per cent of potassium bitartrate, 10 per cent ad valorem," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Argols or crude tartar or wine lees crude, 5 per cent ad valorem; partly refined, containing not more than 90 per cent of potassium bitartrate, 10 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, argols being sediment which collects in wine casks is not a manufactured article, and, of course, does not come in competition to any extent with any product of the United States. The present tariff is 5 per cent ad valorem. It is proposed by this bill to raise the tariff to 10 per cent ad valorem. It is used in the manufacture of cream of tartar for baking-powder purposes. It is proposed by the bill to reduce the tariff on cream of tartar from 5 cents a pound to 2½ cents a pound, cutting both ways. We imported last year nearly 30,000,000 pounds of these argols or crude tartar. Under the provisions of this bill, I think, it is unquestionable that instead of importing the crude tartar from southern Europe they will import the finished product, cream of tartar, and to that extent deprive our industries of the business of refining the tartar into cream of tartar.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will suggest to the gentleman whether that is not applicable to a great deal of this bill.

Mr. MANN. That same condition runs through many parts of this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In other words, it is a revision of American industries downward.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is a striking of American industries downward. Now, the gentleman from New York asserted yesterday that the labor was very little in transferring the crude tartar into cream of tartar. It often happens that the particular labor of transferring a particular article into the finished product is not great, but you have to take into consideration all the labor in connection with the industry, which goes way beyond the mere labor of transferring the crude article into the finished product, because the labor of the country is also engaged in maintaining, in preparing, and in repairing the manufacturing establishments themselves where this work is performed, and that goes to make up the real labor employed in the work which the gentleman from New York has not included in his statement at all. The tariff on crude tartar under the Dingley law was 1 cent a pound, equivalent to about 10 per cent ad valorem, and on the finished product it was 6 cents a pound. In the Payne law we reduced the tariff on the raw article from 10 per cent to 5 per cent and reduced the tariff on the finished product. These gentlemen now propose to increase the tariff on the raw material and also decrease the tariff on the finished product, which means a practical abandonment of the industry in this country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will only take up the time of the committee for a few minutes, and this paragraph illustrates clearly as any in this bill the dividing line between a Republican tariff bill written in the interest of certain manufacturers and a Democratic tariff bill written in the interest of the Government and the consumer. Now, the gentleman is right when he says that we have raised the tax on the raw product and we have lowered the tax on the finished product.

The raw product will be paid for by the manufacturer. The tax on the finished product will be paid by the people; but in the way we have written this bill we will lower the tax to the consumer and we will raise more revenue for the Government.

I do not believe that this change is sufficient to destroy any industry in this country, but it does make certain industries in this country pay a tax themselves that is now being borne by the consumer. The Republican Party has always believed in the doctrine, as far as it was carried out, of untaxing the manufacturer absolutely and putting the entire burden of taxation on competitive articles that the consumer had to pay.

In this bill the imports of argols, out of which cream of tartar is made, amounted to nearly 30,000,000 pounds last year under the Payne bill. The imports of cream of tartar amounted to only 23,000 pounds. The manufacturer brought in thirty millions of raw materials untaxed out of which to make a profit. He had so prohibitive a tariff that there is practically no competition, and the Government opened the door for his raw material, and then under the Payne bill gave him a prohibitive tariff and allowed him, behind that wall, to tax the American people.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman enlighten me? Like all the rest of us benighted Republicans, I am in the dark. Suppose the result of this schedule is this, that the manufactured article should be imported, will we not lose the revenue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, I expect to have more of the manufactured article imported. I am free to say that I do not believe the American manufacturer is entitled to the undisputed right to the American market. If you do that you can not collect revenue at the customhouse. You must allow some importations or the Government can not raise revenue.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman and his committee have imposed the duty upon the raw material, I understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. And we will not get the duty if we do not import the raw material?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly—

Mr. BUTLER. It may be cheaper to import, as I see it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, we expect some amount of raw material to come in as before, because it is needed, but the manufacturer out of his profit will pay that tax to the Government. Now, does not the gentleman believe that the great manufacturing interests of this country, who have the benefit of a protective tariff, either incidentally or direct, are entitled to pay all the tax to the United States Government?

Mr. BUTLER. We all should pay some of the taxes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what we are proposing in this paragraph to do, namely, to make them pay some of the Government taxes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman and his committee have made what I understand is a revenue measure—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman want more time? I have occupied some of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not wish any more time, because I expect to object to anybody else taking more than five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad we have reached a time when the leader of the Democratic Party has admitted that there are tariff duties which the ultimate consumer does not pay. That is my interpretation of the statement he has just made. There are many duties which the ultimate consumer does not pay. The trouble with the gentleman's logic in this case is that it is faulty, as it is in all other matters connected with the tariff, for the duty which he now suggests that the ultimate consumer does not pay is just the duty that he must pay in the nature of things. The gentleman talks about making a manufacturer pay duty and bear the burden of a duty on a noncompetitive article, as though you could load on a manufacturer and retain on the shoulders of a manufacturer the duty on a noncompetitive article used by him in his manufacturing processes. If there is any duty on earth that must in the end be paid by the ultimate consumer, that is the duty. And what the Democratic majority does in this bill is to place directly on American consumers an added burden by increasing the duty on noncompetitive articles of manufacture now on the free list. The increased cost passes from the manufacturer to the consumer with accretions—and I thank my friend from Iowa [Mr. Goob] for the suggestion—and generally with very considerable accretions, whereas the duties we believe in are duties on competitive articles. The history of our industries has proven beyond a question that in the majority of instances the duties paid on competitive articles are borne by the foreign importer, that the competition here by the American producer of like articles compels the foreign importer to pay a large portion of that duty in order to have the benefit of that market.

All through this bill are increases in the burdens that must fall beyond a question on the ultimate consumer, for they are added burdens upon noncompetitive articles, upon articles the like of which we do not produce, articles which we must have in order to manufacture other articles which the people use; and therefore every additional burden made in this bill, all of the tariff taxes made on the $43,000,000 worth of articles taken from the free list—every penny of it—must be borne directly by the American consumer, and we are ready to go to the country on that proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make just a few remarks in connection with the pending proposition. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has stated that there are some duties that the consumer does not pay under certain circumstances. Some gentlemen on the other side seem to think that that would be contrary to Democratic teaching. It has always been the contention of the Democratic Party that the duty paid by the consumer was the duty on the product as it went to him—the duty on the finished product. It has always been understood that any duty on the raw material must be paid by the manufacturer, but that the manufacturer is compensated by the duty on the finished product. If you reduce the duty on the raw material and do not reduce the duty on the finished product, you do not benefit the consumer—you benefit the manufacturer.

Mr. Chairman, all who want to know and understand do know and understand that when the Committee on Ways and Means reduced the tax on cream of tartar, the finished product, they reduced the price to the consumer; and that if they had let the tax remain the same on the finished product, the cream of tartar, it would not have affected the consumer, whether the duty on the raw material was raised or lowered. The fact that they do put a tax on the raw material does not affect the consumer, unless they on that account increase the tax on the finished product.

The Committee on Ways and Means found this condition: 30,000,000 pounds of argol was imported into this country and used in the manufacture of cream of tartar, upon which little revenue was collected. A high prohibitive tax was then put on cream of tartar, but only 23,000 pounds of cream of tartar, or less than one thousandth part of the amount manufactured, was imported under that duty fixed by the Payne bill. That amount of this great commodity of common use was practically nothing. So that while cream of tartar was by this high tax increased greatly in price to the consumer there was no revenue to the Government. Now, when they increase the duty on the argol, if anything like the same amount is imported, there will be a revenue—and a good revenue—derived from that source to the Government, and if perchance by reason of the reduction of the duty on cream of tartar, the finished product, an appreciable amount of the finished product is imported into this country, instead of 23,000 pounds, a negligible quantity, there will be some revenue coming from that; so that the result of this legislation will be to give additional revenue to the Government, to give a decreased price to the consumer, and yet to afford an ample protection—not a robber's protection, but an ample protection—to the manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Texas, I wish to call attention to the fact that this same Committee on Ways and Means took a so-called raw material—iron ore—off the dutiable list and placed it on the free list. They took that revenue of about $280,000 away from the Treasury of the United States and made a present of it to certain iron makers in the East.

Now, why is it that you are transferring here from the free list to the dutiable list a raw material under this paragraph, when in a previous bill, covering the metal schedule, you took a raw material off the dutiable list, bringing a revenue to the Treasury Department, and put that on the free list? Why does not the rule work both ways?

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. HARDY rose.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman wish an answer?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will yield first to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. My understanding is that the condition was entirely different. It was understood that this iron ore in this country was controlled by a trust and that its price was dictated and dominated by the Steel Trust.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, it may have been understood by the gentleman from Texas that a trust controlled the entire output of iron ore in this country, but the testimony taken before committees of this House does not bear out that understanding or statement.

The gentleman's State of Texas is certainly rich in iron ore, and I ask him whether the great fields of iron ore in that State are controlled by the Steel Trust? I am sure they are not so controlled in the State I represent and in many other Southern States that are represented on the floor of this House.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the question of how much control the Steel Trust and allied interests have over the iron-ore supply of this country may be a subject of controversy, but my understanding is that the evidence was that they owned something over 60 per cent and that they absolutely dominated the situation.

Mr. AUSTIN. The testimony showed that they owned about 32 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. That is the gentleman's understanding of the testimony.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is the testimony.

Mr. HARDY. My understanding is the other way. It is a question of a difference of understanding.

Mr. AUSTIN. But you transferred iron ore to the free list, and took from the Treasury this income of $280,000 for the benefit of three trusts, the Pennsylvania Steel Trust, the Bethlehem Steel Trust, and the Maryland Steel Trust. They have no monopoly upon the iron ore of this country, but they have an absolute monopoly of the iron ore from the ore fields of Cuba, where they mine it with cheaper labor than we do in this country.

Mr. BUTLER. They own no iron ore in this country.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to say that instead of it being for the benefit of the trusts, it would operate for the benefit of the independent man who might use some lower-priced iron ore in competition with the trusts. If the trusts paid a tax on the iron ore, they would get it handed back on their exportation of iron products under our draw-back law, while the independent man would have to pay the duty.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then, the so-called independent concerns whom you are seeking to relieve by your legislation are the Pennsylvania Steel Trust, the Bethlehem Steel Trust, and the Maryland Steel Trust?

Mr. HARDY. That is the gentleman's statement; he is absolutely wrong.

Mr. AUSTIN. They are just as much monopolies or trusts as the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. HARDY. That is the gentleman's statement of it; they may be and doubtless are trusts, and in alliance with the Steel Trust. We did not put iron ore on the free list for the benefit of the Bethlehem Steel Trust and Maryland Steel Trust, but for the benefit of the small manufacturer not in alliance with the Steel Trust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph be now closed.

Mr. MANN. I should like five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph close in five minutes, that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his remarks, assumes that you can increase the cost of the raw material to the manufacturer and decrease the price of the finished product, without in any way affecting the industry. I do not propose to argue that question, because to a mind so constituted that it is not a self-evident proposition argument would probably be of no avail. [Applause on the Republican side.] But we have an illustration of the situation in this very item itself. On cream of tartar it is now proposed to increase the cost of the raw material and to decrease the tariff on the finished product. Cream of tartar itself has a history in tariff legislation, which history is instructive. Under the Dingley tariff law the duty on cream of tartar was 6 cents a pound, and there was imported in 1909—I take the figures given in the report of the committee—a total of 399 pounds. That was under a tariff of 6 cents a pound, practically a prohibitive tariff. The Payne law reduced the duty from 6 cents a pound to 5 cents a pound, and in one year the importations jumped from 399 pounds to 116,278 pounds. Reducing the tariff 20 per cent, from 6 cents a pound to 5 cents a pound, brought us in competition with cream of tartar made abroad and greatly increased the importations. While this was done we decreased the tariff on raw material. We reduced the tariff on crude tartar at the same time that we reduced the tariff on the finished product, cream of tartar.

And yet, in spite of that, the reduction of the tariff of 1 cent a pound on cream of tartar resulted in a large importation into the country. It is now proposed in one paragraph to increase the tariff on the raw material 100 per cent and to reduce the tariff on the finished product from 5 cents a pound to 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. In a moment I will. Now, no one can tell how much importations will be increased. It is true that the importations in 1910 of 116,000 pounds was on the basis of 8½ cents a pound. The price of cream of tartar abroad went up, and the importations of 1911 were 23,000 pounds, on a basis of 14½ cents a pound, while the average cost in the United States at the same time was 18½ cents a pound, 4 cents a pound more than the imported article cost, even after the price had gone up abroad. That means ruination of the industry of the United States.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Is the gentleman from Illinois aware of the fact that the process of refining argols consists of dissolving them in hot water, filtering them, and putting crude and refined on the same ad valorem basis will still leave the manufacturer a margin of good profit?

Mr. MANN. I am aware that that is not all there is in the process from the crude tartar to the cream of tartar. There are several processes in between. There are several provided for in this very paragraph between the crude tartar and the cream of tartar. The gentleman from New York assumes without information on the subject that crude tartar is instantly transferred into cream of tartar. This means ruination; that is your policy, and we protest against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out of page 3, lines 22 to 25, inclusive, and on page 4 down to and including the semicolon, line 2, reading as follows: "10. Balsams: Copaiba, fir or Canada, Peru, tolu, and all other balsams, which are natural and uncompounded and not suitable for the manufacture of perfumery and cosmetics, if in a crude state, not advanced in value or condition by any process or treatment whatever beyond that essential to the proper packing of the balsams and the prevention of decay or deterioration pending manufacture, 10 per cent ad valorem; if advanced in value or condition by any process or."

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Balsams: Copaiba, fir or Canada, tolu, and all other balsams."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes to retain on the free list balsams in their crude state. They are now on the free list. It may be well to say that in this amendment I have offered, and others which I shall offer, to strike out of the dutiable list articles now on the free list, if they would be agreed to, would result in leaving them on the free list under the free-list provisions of the Payne law.

This bill undertakes to substitute these provisions for the provisions of Schedule A of the Payne law. That schedule does not include a free list. Striking an item out of this bill on the dutiable list which is now on the free list of the Payne law will leave that item on the free list under the free-list provision.

This is a medicinal article to a large extent, noncompetitive, a crude material. Yet it is proposed to transfer it from the free list to the dutiable list in the interest of the people. How absolutely absurd gentlemen can get when they talk about "the interests of the people"!

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the bill proposes to place upon the taxable list these balsams which were heretofore free, and we expect to derive a revenue of $11,700 by so doing. These balsams are chiefly used in the manufacture of perfumes, cosmetics, and patent medicines; they used to be prescribed by physicians pretty generally—

Mr. BUTLER. And used for making cough medicines.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And for cough medicines. Nowadays physicians prescribe medical compounds, and these articles go into the preparation of patent medicines. The flavoring extracts which are sold as patent medicines are very high priced, and it is not believed that imposing a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on the materials of manufacture will materially increase the price to the consumer, but in any event it is purely a revenue measure and will produce nearly $12,000 in revenue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ought to state that I erred in saying these balsams were used in the preparation of perfumes, because those are taxed in another paragraph of the bill. These balsams are used in manufacturing patent medicines.

Mr. BUTLER. Principally cough medicines.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman, Who has made the estimate of the value of imports under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman that they were prepared by a clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means in collaboration with an expert from the Treasury Department.

Mr. LONGWORTH. From the Tariff Board?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; from the Treasury Department.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask the gentleman this question. Referring to this specific item, I observe that as to the first three of these balsams it is estimated that the imports will be less under a duty of 10 per cent than heretofore, but as to the last two items it is estimated that the imports will be larger under a duty of 10 per cent than heretofore. I would ask the gentleman why?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman will look not at the year 1911 alone, which was not a normal year, but will examine the average of preceding years, he will correct his statement. It is natural to suppose that the imposition of a tax will slightly restrict importations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But I find in the estimates of the committee that, for instance, the value of the imports in 1911 of tolu was three thousand and odd dollars, and under this bill, under a 10 per cent duty, it is estimated they will be $5,000. Does the gentleman mean that they have gone back over a number of years and estimated the values under those years?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] who prepared this bill, is very likely the best-informed man in the House on the subject of the chemical schedule and the chemical items of which it consists. Yet it is a queer illustration of the methods of legislation when the gentleman from New York, who drafted the bill, who passed the bill through the caucus and through the Committee on Ways and Means, and who is its defender upon the floor, in answer to the amendment which I offered concerning these balsams, states that they were used principally for the preparation of cosmetics and perfumery, and did not know differently from his own information upon the subject, and did not state differently until an outsider, who I am glad to see upon the floor of the House though in contravention of the rules of the House, gave him the information.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken in saying that the presence upon the floor of this gentleman is in contravention of the rules, because he appears here as a clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MANN. He is an employee of the Government and can not be both.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Committee on Ways and Means has never elected the gentleman a clerk. No member of the Committee on Ways and Means can select any clerk for that committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman being on the floor.

Mr. DALZELL. Nor have I, but I object to the gentleman from New York making the statement he has made.

Mr. MANN. He could not occupy both places under the law. However, I am glad that the gentleman was here to correct the gentleman from New York, because I would hate to have it go out to the country that the gentleman from New York, the only man on the Democratic side of the House who pretended to know anything about the chemical schedule, did not know that these balsams were not used for perfumery or cosmetics, but were used only for medical purposes. It is no wonder that we have bills of this kind presented to the House when gentlemen who draw them know neither what is in them nor about the subjects which they contain. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

23. Coal-tar products known as dead and creosote oil, soluble and sulfonated dead and creosote oil, anthracene and anthracene oil, benzol, naphthol, resorcin, toluol, xylol; all the foregoing not medicinal and not colors or dyes, 5 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, lines 15 to 19, by striking out the following:

"23. Coal-tar products known as dead and creosote oil, soluble and sulfonated dead and creosote oil, anthracene and anthracene oil, benzol, naphthol, resorcin, toluol, xylol; all the foregoing not medicinal and not colors or dyes, 5 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these coal-tar products are now on the free list. The Agricultural Department of this Government for years has been making investigations and publishing the results of those investigations, urging that the results be followed in the preserving of railroad ties and other woods which are in common use for fence posts, telegraph and telephone poles, and a great many other ways in which wood is used, to dip the wood in various ways in this dead creosote oil.

We have been trying to educate the users of this timber in the country, rapidly disappearing, to prolong its life by preserving it through the use of these materials. The extensive use of this dead creosote oil has only recently come into practice. We are trying on the one hand to get people to make use of it. It was put on the free list so that it might be presented as cheaply as possible. We consume enormous quantities of our forest products in the mere matter of railway ties. Various railroads are now trying, on the urging of the Agricultural Department, to preserve the railroad ties by the use of this dead creosote oil, and now it is proposed to transfer this item from the free list to the dutiable list and require every ounce of it that comes into the country to pay a duty on the theory that the Government needs it for revenue. We spend twice as much every year in the Agricultural Department trying to encourage people to make use of it as the revenue derived from it will amount to. There is no excuse for putting a tariff upon this product, a by-product not in competition with other products, thereby discouraging its use by increasing its price.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, under the Payne law creosote oil was on the tax list at 20 per cent ad valorem. By a decision of an official of the Treasury Department creosote oil was reclassified and placed upon the free list. The subject has been one of much political discussion, and I do not propose to entertain the committee now with a further rehearsing of the matter; but creosote oil at a 5 per cent ad valorem rate, it is calculated, will produce $115,000 worth of revenue, and more revenue, in addition, will be derived from naphthol, and perhaps from some of the other subjects mentioned in paragraph 23 of our bill. I have already several times stated the basis or methods upon which we have rearranged the taxes on coal-tar products. Creosote oil and anthracene oil are among the primary coal-tar products, and we have put them at the lowest rate of tax that we have imposed upon any of the coal-tar products.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that creosote oil was on the dutiable list under the Payne law. Paragraph 536 of the Payne tariff law, giving the items in the free list not on the dutiable list, includes coal tar, crude, pitch of coal tar, and products of coal tar known as dead or creosote oil, and a long list of other articles which have been now transferred under the various paragraphs of this bill from the free list to the dutiable list. What is the use of the gentleman saying that it was on the dutiable list under the Payne law?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

24. Coal-tar products known as anilin oil and salts, toluidin, xylidin, cumidin, binitrotoluol, binitrobenzol, benzidin, tolidin, dianisidin, naphthylamin, diphenylamin, benzaldehyde, benzyl chloride, nitro-benzol and nitrotoluol, naphthylaminsulfoacids and their sodium or potassium salts, naphtholsulfoacids and their sodium or potassium salts, amidonaphtholsulfoacids and their sodium or potassium salts, amidosalicylic acid, binitrochlorbenzol, diamidostilbendisulfoacid, metanilic acid, paranitranilin, dimethylanilin; all the foregoing not medicinal and not colors or dyes, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand an explanation of this paragraph which has just been read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out of lines 20 to 25, page 6, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, page 7, the following:—

"24. Coal-tar products known as anilin oil and salts, toluidin, xylidin, cumidin, binitrotoluol, binitrobenzol, benzidin, tolidin, dianisidin, naphthylamin, diphenylamin, benzaldehyde, benzyl chloride, nitro-benzol and nitrotoluol, naphthylaminsulfoacids and their sodium or potassium salts, naphtholsulfoacids and their sodium or potassium salts, amidonaphtholsulfoacids and their sodium or potassium salts, amidosalicylic acid, binitrochlorbenzol, diamidostilbendisulfoacid, metanilic acid, paranitranilin, dimethylanilin; all the foregoing not medicinal and not colors or dyes, 10 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these very important articles, important especially judging from their names, are now upon the free list, and it seems to me that they ought to remain upon the free list. The effect of my amendment is to strike them out of the dutiable list and they will then remain on the free list under the provisions of existing law. It is true that the gentleman from New York has frequently explained that it is the purpose of his side of the House to place coal-tar products upon the dutiable list. These coal-tar products are, in the main, by-products and basic products for the manufacture of other important articles. You do not encourage industry in our country by putting a tariff duty upon these basic or crude products. You do encourage industry in our country by admitting them free of duty so that they can be used for the manufacture of other articles in our country, and, as the gentleman from New York has frequently stated that it has been their policy to place a duty upon these coal-tar products, basic articles, I say it is our policy to endeavor to build up the industries of our own country rather than the industries of countries foreign to our shores. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the latter half of these unpronounceable products were formerly taxed at 20 per cent, and the Payne law put them on the free list. They are not free raw materials. They are intermediate products, partly finished products, and it is a fair surmise that they were put on the free list in the Payne law simply for the benefit of one manufacturer in my State, who, with very little labor, assembles these products and has been selling them under a protective duty of 30 per cent ad valorem on his finished products. It seems to me, and it seemed to me three years ago, that these are very proper subjects for taxation, and the low rate of 10 per cent which we have placed upon them, it is expected, will produce a revenue of $167,500. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is true that a portion of these products are articles which were upon the dutiable list under the Dingley law. In the revision of that law by the Payne law they were placed upon the free list. The gentlemen on that side of the aisle have kept the air throughout the country in continual commotion telling how we failed to reduce the tariff in the Payne law as we had promised to do, and yet we find them attempting to take articles which we had taken off the dutiable list and placed on the free list under the Payne law and putting them on the dutiable list on their claim that they have the country behind them, because we did not sufficiently reduce the tariff downward in the Payne law. That is real logic for you.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if any of these articles are manufactured in the United States, practically?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I believe very few, if any, of them are.

Mr. HILL. The effort made three years ago to develop the further industry beyond these first derivatives was an honest one. I will tell the gentleman from his own report why they are not manufactured in the United States. If the gentleman will look on page 4, he will find the rate of wages and salaries paid by the American chemical industry to all its employees, and if he turns to page 370, which is a part of the glossary prepared by the Tariff Board, he will find that in the competitive industry in Germany, taking the salaries of all the insured employees, which included salaries as high as $1,400, the actual wages paid in Germany in the manufacture of all these chemicals average $291.55 per year per employee, as against $738 per annum paid in the United States in making the same articles. It seems to me that that is a pretty fair reason for their not being made in the United States and for their being made in Germany. It is impossible under existing conditions, and in all probability will be for the next 20 or 25 years, to make these articles in the United States. So you are simply putting a burden upon the people of the United States during that time by taxing these raw materials.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cobalt, oxide of, 10 cents per pound.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This bill, like all other important measures, is brought into this House as the product of a secret Democratic caucus, which bound all Democrats to vote for the bill and against all amendments. So, while the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with his bland and benevolent manner, pretends to give us liberal opportunity for debate and amendment, he knows and we know that both are absolutely useless and ineffective here, for the most convincing arguments and the most necessary and attractive amendments will go down to defeat before the solid, deaf vote which is pledged in advance against them.

Both debate and amendments are a farce, and your side of the House, which has declaimed so much in recent years about the need of personal independence here and the dangers of arbitrary power, is crushing out all individual influence and effciency in a manner unexampled in my experience. The country, I think, was persuaded by you that the power of the Speaker had grown so great that it was impairing the individual responsibility of Members; but I think the country will be even more strongly and indignantly convinced that responsibility for all important legislation should not be shifted to a party caucus, but that the proper place for effective debate and discussion and amendment is the open House and not the secret caucus of one side of the House. But history is only repeating itself, and I trust the results also will be repeated.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman what is his opinion on that subject?

Mr. GILLET. I will tell you before I get through.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You would not be willing to give me a categorical answer now as to what your opinion is on that subject?

Mr. GILLET. My opinion is against the present conduct of the House. But I am going to give some authority that will go much farther, both with the gentleman and with the committee, than anything I can say. As I said, history is simply repeating itself, and the conduct of the Democratic Party to-day is simply following the precedent set by the Democratic Party 30 years ago. I chanced to be reading recently the works of one of the greatest statesmen and debaters and leaders who ever adorned this House—James A. Garfield—and I ran across this description of the conduct of the Democratic Party then. His words will not, I suppose, either please or influence that side of the House any more than they did when uttered, but they will carry weight to impartial and thoughtful minds, and public opinion will respond to them as it did before. He said:

I have been 16 years a Member of the House of Representatives, and in all that period I have never once known * * * the members of the Republican Party to bind themselves in a caucus to support any bill before Congress. I have seen it tried once or twice, but I have always seen dozens of Republicans spring to their feet and say, "We are free men and we will vote according to the interests of our constituents and the dictates of our conscience, and no caucus shall bind us." But the moment the Democratic Party got back into power again that moment they organized the caucus—the secret caucus, the oath-bound caucus; for in the recent extra session they actually took oaths not to divulge what occurred in caucus and to be bound by whatever the caucus decreed. And I have known man after man, who had before sworn by all the wicked gods at once that he would not be bound to vote for a certain measure, walk out of the caucus like a sheep led to the slaughter and vote for the bill that he had cursed. They brought forward bills at the extra session so full of manifest errors that when we pointed them out they would admit in private that they were errors which ought to be corrected, but they would say, "We have agreed to vote for it and without amendment, and we will." We pointed out wretchedly bad grammar in bills, and they would not even correct this grammar, because the caucus had adopted it. Now, therefore, gentlemen, the Congress of the United States is ruled by a caucus. It has ceased to be a deliberative body. It is ruled by secret caucus.

The conduct of the Democratic Party, which Garfield reproached, then, is exactly the conduct which the same Bourbon Democracy is repeating to-day, and I believe that the same conditions will produce the same results and that the voters of the country will repudiate and defeat those tactics now as they did before. [Applause on the Republican side.] The words of Daniel Webster are just as pertinent to-day as they were 90 years ago: "It is time to put an end to caucuses." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. I—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to speak to the pending amendment. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with amusement to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offering amendments to this chemical schedule that he does not understand—

Mr. MANN. How do you know? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN (continuing). Amendments containing names that he can not himself pronounce, and some amendments which, I think, should they be adopted, he would vote against the bill on the final passage. You have so little to talk about now that you harp on amendments that you do not believe in, and abuse the Democratic caucus. The Republican side of this House has been reduced to such a small minority that you have not enough to have a real caucus. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

We have a real, live Democratic caucus, and it is bringing into this House measures that look to the greatest good to the greatest number. There are gentlemen on that side who recall the last, or Sixty-first, Congress, presided over by a Republican nominated in a Republican caucus, denounced by honest insurgents in this House, who charged that Members had to go with their hats in their hands to this Republican Speaker to get him to let them, in the name of their people, call up a bill for consideration by this House. When I look upon that side and see how, on account of your broken promises and faithlessness to the people, you have been repudiated, and that Speaker taken out of that chair and a Democratic Speaker placed in his stead, and a majority on this side legislating in the interest of the people, I say again, Long live the Democratic caucus! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

About all you can say now is, "Confound the Democratic caucus." [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democratic caucus has given you a great deal of trouble and will give you a great deal more. It has given us weapons with which to cut the dirt from under the feet of some of you who are offering amendments—gentlemen whose record on tariff reduction is such that the places that know you now will soon know you no more forever. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

28. Drugs, such as barks, beans, berries, buds, bulbs, bulbous roots, excrescences, fruits, flowers, dried fibers, dried insects, grains, gums, herbs, leaves, lichens, mosses, nuts, nutgalls, roots, stems, vegetables, seeds (aromatic, not garden seeds), seeds of morbid growth, weeds, and woods used expressly for dyeing or tanning; any of the foregoing which are natural and uncompound drugs and not edible and not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, but which are advanced in value or condition by peeling, shredding, grinding, chipping, crushing, or any other process or treatment whatever beyond that essential to the proper packing of the drugs and the prevention of decay or deterioration pending manufacture, 10 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That no article containing alcohol shall be classified for duty under this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 22 to 25, page 7, and lines 1 to 11, page 8, as follows:

"28. Drugs, such as barks, beans, berries, buds, bulbs, bulbous roots, excrescences, fruits, flowers, dried fibers, dried insects, grains, gums, herbs, leaves, lichens, mosses, nuts, nutgalls, roots, stems, vegetables, seeds (aromatic, not garden seeds), seeds of morbid growth, weeds, and woods used expressly for dyeing or tanning; any of the foregoing which are natural and uncompound drugs and not edible, and not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, but which are advanced in value or condition by peeling, shredding, grinding, chipping, crushing, or any other process or treatment whatever beyond that essential to the proper packing of the drugs and the prevention of decay or deterioration pending manufacture, 10 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That no article containing alcohol shall be classified for duty under this paragraph."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these articles, crude drugs, are now on the free list under the existing Payne tariff law. It is proposed by this bill to take them from the free list and place them upon the dutiable list. If my amendment to strike them out of the dutiable list prevails, they will remain on the free list under the existing provisions of law.

I do not think it necessary to make an argument in favor of having crude drugs, wholly noncompetitive in character, upon the free list.

I do not wonder that my genial friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] chafes under the necessity of voting against amendments to leave these articles upon the free list. Not long since in the House the gentleman [Mr. HEFLIN] derided this side of the House because, he said, we had opposed placing agricultural implements on the free list. Within a few minutes after he made that speech I offered an amendment on the floor of the House to place these agricultural implements on the free list, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] voted against it. [Laughter on the Republican side.] One moment he declaimed in favor of a proposition, and when called by an amendment backed water, reversing his position and voting against a proposition which, if he and others on that side of the House had voted for it, would now be in the metal-schedule bill.

I think it is going too far, Mr. Chairman, to place crude drugs upon the dutiable list, to lay a tax upon all the sick people of the country, and especially upon the gentlemen on that side of the House, who after the next election will be the sickest crowd you ever saw. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday to the entertaining argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] practically to the same effect as the remarkable statement he has just made; but I think he is laboring under a real misapprehension as to the effect of paragraph 28 of our bill, which he now proposes by this amendment to strike out.

Paragraph 28 of our bill is substantially the same as the corresponding paragraph 20 of the Payne-Aldrich law, excepting that it reduces the tax upon these drugs when they are advanced in value or condition from a quarter of a cent a pound and 10 per cent ad valorem to a flat 10 per cent ad valorem rate; and it mentions the same drugs in paragraph 88, on page 22, of our bill as being on the free list, as they are now, when they are not advanced in value or condition.

The further difference in our paragraph from paragraph 20 of the Payne law is simply that we have defined what "advanced in value or condition" means, and we have made this further definition upon the suggestion of the officials of the New York customhouse, who represented to us that under the guise of coming in not advanced in value or condition, these drugs, barks, berries, and so forth, were being advanced in value or condition in foreign countries and sent in here free.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in a very specious argument, yesterday said, "How could bark come in unless it is peeled?" It is not the bark that is peeled; it is the tree that is peeled. The bark is not peeled to advance it further in value. An example of the peeling meant by this bill is found, for instance, in the roots of the plant out of which they make Pond's Extract. If they send the roots of that plant here peeled, they are advanced in value or condition, especially so under our new definition of advancing in value, and it is for that purpose, and that purpose only, that we have made this definition. Crude drugs are still on the free list, the way they were before, while drugs advanced in value are defined as to what constitutes advancing in value, and the rates of taxation on them are reduced.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had to say about an amendment that he offered some time ago to the steel schedule putting agricultural implements on the free list. We have occasionally in this House a piece of grim humor. That amendment regarding agricultural implements was a piece of grim humor on the part of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It was.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Republican Party in this House has had 16 years in which to put agricultural implements on the free list, and during that time the men who toiled to make the stuff with which to feed the world have had to pay enormous taxes to the Implement Trust—taxes imposed by your party [applause on the Democratic side]; and when my party came in power in this House and gave you gentlemen on that side an opportunity to vote to put agricultural implements on the free list you opposed it. Now, when we bring in a tariff measure, revising the tariff schedule by schedule in our own way, we do not propose to allow you to embarrass us or endanger the passage of the bill by sticking in amendments that you yourselves do not believe in and would not vote for if they were adopted in Committee of the Whole. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am reminded of what occurred here once with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who had the frankness to admit that when he offered an amendment to one of our tariff bills that he did so for the purpose of loading the bill down and then voting against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should not have voted for the amendment I offered placing agricultural implements on the free list, but is that any reason why you should not vote for it, you who are in favor of it? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly, for that was not the time for it. We knew that you were not in earnest about it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. It was offered to the metal schedule and was held in order. That was the time to put agricultural implements on the free list if you meant it. You did not mean it; it was pure buncombe. When you passed the bill at the special session of Congress you had no intention of its becoming a law, and when you were offered a chance on the floor to put that into the metal schedule where it might become effective, you promptly voted it down by a unanimous vote on the Democratic side, including the gentleman from Alabama, who had just made a speech in favor of it. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. I am on record as voting for and speaking for the placing of agricultural implements on the free list. The gentleman from Illinois is now frank enough to admit that he would not have voted for his own amendment putting agricultural implements on the free list. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I did not; I offered it for the purpose of playing a practical joke and testing the sincerity of the gentleman from Alabama, who had just made one of those so-called high-fallutin speeches [laughter on the Republican side] about what he would do if he had a chance. I gave him the chance and he fell down. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York says that the bark is not peeled, the tree is peeled. You peel the bark off the tree, which is peeled? [Laughter.] You do not peel the tree off the bark, you peel the bark off the tree. The gentleman from New York, the father of this bill, does not even know what peeling a tree means. [Laughter.] He proposes that crude drugs shall not come in free if any of them have been peeled, shredded, ground, chipped, or cut; practically all of them come in that shape. It is true that the Treasury Department has been unsuccessful in its efforts to hold that the drugs have been advanced and therefore dutiable; it is the duty of the Treasury Department to collect duty when it can. The courts have held that these articles were on the free list, and the gentleman from New York has said to the House that, finding drugs are now on the free list, he proposes to put them on the dutiable list at the expense of the people of the country who are ill and suffering from sickness.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from New York if they will not propose an amendment striking out the word "peeling." I ask it as a business proposition. I know it is perfectly useless for me to offer such an amendment, but I will read from a letter which I have received on this subject:

Quebracho wood, logwood, fustic wood, Brazil wood, and numerous other woods that are used for making extracts for dyeing or tanning, are imported into this country without having on the bark, or in other words, they are peeled. The reason for this is that the bark is of no value, and therefore it would only make extra weight in shipping, and in fact, after the tree is cut and the wood is allowed to lie for a while and cure, the bark—a good deal of it—will come off of itself, and so they simply take an axe and chop off the bark and ship the wood; therefore if peeling is to be considered a process of advancement in valuation, then all the raw material that is used by the tanning and dyewood extract people would have to pay 10 per cent ad valorem, when up to the present time they have always been free.

Mr. Chairman, I can not see any earthly benefit that is to come to anybody by compelling these people to ship the useless bark which remaining upon the log tends to destroy the value of the wood which they are shipping, causing it to rot and decay. Enormous quantities of this material, logwood, quebracho, and dyewoods of various kinds are shipped here. It is heavy when it is first cut and it is allowed to lie on the ground until it is dried out, and the bark partially rots off. They then take an ax and clean off the rest of the bark, and you may as well compel them to bring the stumps of the trees that are left in Honduras and the Argentine Republic as to compel them to bring this bark in. Recognizing that no amendment is to be accepted upon this bill, I appeal to the generosity of gentlemen upon the other side and ask them if they will not themselves propose the elimination of the words "by peeling," only. I do not care anything about the "shipping, crushing, shredding," and so forth. That is an advancement which requires labor, but if the bark rots off in the processes of nature, surely they ought not be compelled to bring it into this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

29. Ergot, 10 cents per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 8, by striking out of line 12 the following:
"29. Ergot, 10 cents per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, ergot, a necessary medicine, is now upon the free list. This bill places it upon the dutiable list, and if my amendment prevails it will remain on the free list under existing conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

30. Ethers: Sulphuric, 4 cents per pound; amyl nitrite, 20 per cent ad valorem but not less than 10 cents per pound; amyl acetate and ethyl acetate or acetic ether, 5 cents per pound; ethyl chloride, 20 per cent ad valorem; ethers of all kinds not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 25 per cent ad valorem but not less than 25 cents per pound: Provided, That no article containing alcohol shall be classified for duty under this paragraph.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will ask the gentleman from New York if sulphuric ether is used in the manufacture of smokeless powder?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; it is.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it a principal ingredient?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; it is not a principal ingredient. Sulphuric ether is the ether with which we are familiar in operations.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the duty on sulphuric ether reduced by this bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is reduced from 8 cents a pound to 4 cents per pound.

Mr. MURDOCK. In view of the statement of the gentleman from New York, made on another item farther back, in regard to baking powder, why was this reduced, when sulphuric ether is used largely by a trust in the manufacture of smokeless powder?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that that is not the chief use of sulphuric ether. The chief use of sulphuric ether is medicinal. Its familiar form is used in operations, and it was largely with that in view that it was thought wise to reduce the tax upon it.

Mr. MURDOCK. And not in view of the other circumstance?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

31. Extracts of nutgalls and of Persian berries, 1 cent per pound; extracts of quebracho, of hemlock bark, of sumac, and extracts and decoctions of logwood and other dyewoods, extracts of barks and of woods other than dyewoods, such as are commonly used for dyeing or tanning, and all extracts of vegetable origin suitable for dyeing, coloring, staining, or tanning, all the foregoing not containing alcohol, not medicinal, and not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, three-eighths of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 24, after the word "quebracho" insert the words "one-quarter of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest justification for any duty whatever on quebracho, except the necessity of revenue, and out of sympathy for the new-born regard of the gentlemen on the other side for the revenue, I have offered this amendment to reduce the tariff on quebracho from three-eighths of a cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent a pound instead of to place it on the free list, as I should otherwise have done. Quebracho is a tree native to South America, the bark of which contains large quantities of red tannin, used in tanning leather. It is not produced in this country, and if it is to bear any duty at all the duty ought not to exceed a quarter of a cent a pound.

But, Mr. Chairman, I arose chiefly to answer the claim that this bill represented a reduction in the duties on articles contained in Schedule A. I was astonished yesterday when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], in response to a question which I asked him, stated that the bill was a substantial reduction in the duties of Schedule A of the present law. It is not so. The bill purports to increase the revenue from this schedule from $13,006,046 in 1911 to $16,101,595, an approximate increase of $3,000,000. I am willing to admit that it would be theoretically possible to lower the duties in this bill and still by increased importations to increase the revenue from it; but that is not what is done by this bill. Three million eight hundred thousand dollars of the revenue which we are informed by the Ways and Means Committee will be raised by this bill is to be raised by taking articles which are now on the free list and placing them on the dutiable list. In this way $38,000,000 in value of importations, which under the present law come in free, are now to be taxed at an average rate approximating 12 per cent.

The articles thus taken from the free list include such items as creosote oil, used for the preservation from decay of fence posts, telephone poles, and railroad ties. Crude camphor, used every day in every home in the land and imported to an extent of a million dollars annually, is taken from the free list and taxed at 10 per cent. Shellac, imported to the extent of $3,000,000 annually, is to be taken from the free list and taxed at a cent a pound. This article is used in great quantities as a filler in floors and in the manufacture of varnish. Then there is cinnamon, cloves, ginger, mace, nutmeg, and pepper, all household necessities, imported to the extent of $2,400,000, which you propose to take from the free list and tax at an average rate of 15 per cent. This class includes vanilla beans, imported in the sum of $1,950,000. This is the raw product out of which extract of vanilla, found in every pantry in every household in the country, is made. Vanilla beans are taken from the free list and taxed at 50 cents a pound.

These are but illustrations of the things which this bill does. Obviously, as these articles are not produced in this country, the duty will in every instance be added to the foreign price and incidentally several times compounded by the time the article reaches the ultimate consumer.

But in addition to the $38,000,000 of imports which you take from the free list and add to the dutiable list, you increase the duty over those in the present law on an additional $8,000,000 of importations. This increase is at an average rate of 19.8 per cent. This class includes argols, a by-product of wine manufacture, imported to the extent of $3,000,000 annually and used in the manufacture of cream of tartar, which in turn is used in making the higher grades of baking powder. The duty upon argols is increased from 5 to 10 per cent. It includes chicle, used in the manufacture of chewing gum and imported to the extent of $2,500,000, according to the estimate, upon which you double the duty, increasing it from 10 to 20 per cent. This class includes the various forms of opium, upon which the already high duty is doubled. This increase would probably not be subject to criticism if it could accomplish any other result than the increase of the smuggling of the drug.

But there is yet another class of articles upon which the duty is neither increased nor decreased. The estimated importations under the paragraphs in this class amount to $11,500,000. It includes crude glycerin, imported annually to the extent of $4,500,000, and many other articles of common use and consumption. So that in the aggregate this bill increases the duty or leaves it where it is in the present law on more than $58,000,000 of importations, while the total amount of importations which in 1910 were taxable under the present law amounted to a trifle over $42,000,000. On $46,000,000 of these estimated importations the average increase of duty is 14.5 per cent.

But there is yet another class of importations which are taxed under this bill, amounting to $38,000,000, but upon this class the duty is decreased. Twenty-five million dollars of these importations will come in under seven items of the bill. These items include quebracho, alkalies, alkaloids, and so forth, medicinal preparations not containing alcohol, linseed oil, olive oils, and coal-tar dyes, upon which an average reduction is made of only 9.75 per cent. The average decrease in duty upon the entire $38,000,000 of importations upon which the duty is decreased is 15.17 per cent. And yet, in the face of the fact that the duty is increased an average of 14.5 per cent on $46,000,000 of importations and left unchanged on $11,000,000 additional, as against $38,000,000 upon which it is decreased 15.17 per cent, we are asked to believe that the present bill makes a reduction in the duties of this schedule. It ought not to have been necessary to go beyond the mere statement of the fact that under the present law in 1910 we taxed $42,021,558 of importations 26.41 per cent, while this bill proposes to tax $96,742,850 in importations at an average rate of 16.64 per cent, to demonstrate that this bill in the aggregate is not a reduction of the duties of this schedule. There are some reductions in the bill for which I should be glad to vote if it were possible to vote upon them separately. These include the item of quebracho, upon which I offer an amendment to still further reduce the tariff, and paints and varnishes. But I should not be justified in voting increased taxes on a much greater amount in value of noncompetitive importations in order to obtain this small relief from the duties on these competitive articles. This bill is not in the aggregate a downward revision of the schedule; it in no particular recognizes the principles of protection. Its sole object is to raise revenue and this largely by increased duties. For these reasons I shall vote against it.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota is to reduce the duty on quebracho extract as carried in the bill from three-eighths of 1 cent a pound to one-quarter of 1 cent a pound. The effective rate on quebracho in the present law is three-fourths of 1 cent a pound, which we have cut in two in the bill reported and tax it at three-eighths of a cent a pound—just the same rate we have applied to all, or substantially all, of the other tanning extracts carried in paragraph 31 of the bill. My objection still further to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is that, according to my theory, noncompetitive products are the proper subject of taxation, and the proposed reduction from three-eighths of a cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent a pound would deprive us of $112,000 of revenue. I therefore hope that the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

33. Formaldehyde solution containing not more than 40 per cent of formaldehyde, or formaline, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman who is chairman of the subcommittee if formaldehyde is placed at a less rate in this bill than it was in the last bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; in the last bill it was carried in the basket clause at 25 per cent, and our rate of taxation is 4 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOWLER. It is used in treating a number of things to destroy fungus, I believe.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; and as a disinfectant. The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

36. Glycerin, crude, not purified, 1 cent per pound; refined, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I do not rise particularly to discuss the amendment, but to discuss another subject germane to the amendment, and that is the subject of oleomargarine. As glycerin is one of the ingredients used in the production of oleomargarine, I take it that my remarks will be germane to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, in view of the most persistent and determined effort now being made to repeal the present oleo law, the urgent appeal that has been made through the press, the thousands of letters that are being sent out from Washington, the resolutions and letters coming to Washington urging its repeal, and now that the subcommittee has reported a bill back to the Committee on Agriculture and that this question is likely to come up and that Congress is likely to repeal or modify the present law in a way, I believe, that will open the doors wide open to fraud, deception, and counterfeiting, and in view of these letters which have been sent out I rose more for the purpose of having printed in the Record what purports to be a copy of a letter sent out by a gentleman, a Member of this House, and which I wish to read to the committee:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, December 1, 1910.

DEAR MADAM: I am inclosing herewith extracts from the testimony of labor leaders, Government scientists, and other experts, at hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, United States House of Representatives, last spring showing the need of an immediate and thorough investigation of the spread of tuberculosis and other diseases through dairy products, making disclosures which demand that the United States Government take action to eradicate these diseases in our dairy animals, and showing that the 10-cent tax on colored oleomargarine is a tax upon a wholesome, nutritious article of food, which keeps it out of legitimate competition with butter and accounts for the present high prices for butter throughout the country.

May I ask your organization to pass a resolution at its next meeting demanding an investigation by Congress of the spread of disease to human beings from dairy products, and a second resolution demanding the repeal of the 10-cent tax upon oleomargarine? Copies of these resolutions should be sent to your Congressman, United States Senators, chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, all Washington, D. C., and I would appreciate it if you would send me a copy.

Yours, sincerely,

A. S. BURLINSON, M. C.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to offer for his sending this letter, but I want to say to my friends that I regret exceedingly that this question should be injected into this controversy, because it was understood from the beginning that the question of wholesomeness should not enter into it, but that the consumer and the people might determine that for themselves; but now that this has been injected into this controversy I deem it just to all concerned that there should also be printed in the Record extracts from the testimony given before the committee against its wholesomeness, in order that the House and the people may know both sides of the question and that it shall not be decided on ex parte evidence.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to detain the House, but will ask permission to extend my remarks by having printed in the Record extracts from the testimony given before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Iowa indicate somewhat the nature of the testimony he intends to print in the Record and when that testimony was offered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I should not object to having what he wishes inserted in the Record, but I shall object to having it inserted in the middle of this tariff discussion, where I am trying to make some record in regard to the tariff proposition. I do not wish to have some 10, 20, or 30 pages, or something like that, inserted in the Record if I can help it.

Mr. HAUGEN. What I wish to insert in the Record is page 190, page 192, page 198, and a few extracts from a few pages of the recent hearing in the Sixty-first Congress, and also a few extracts from the hearings of 1900, and I will state that I have—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to incorporate in the Record the articles which he mentions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman that I am not willing to have the matter, entirely foreign to this bill, inserted in the Record at this place.

Mr. HAUGEN. I expect this will not take up more than two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I wish to print a letter from Mr. Thomas, who claims to represent the Iowa Retail Merchants' Association—

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman make his request to the House when it can go in the proper place in the Record?

Mr. HAUGEN. The subject would not have been germane at that time, but it is germane at the present time.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will print it as a separate speech?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection, if it is not inserted here.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will print it as a separate speech.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the right to object, I will say to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] that I am perfectly willing that he should have the right to extend his remarks in the Record by printing any testimony offered before committees in this House in the consideration of bills recently before the House and before the committee; but I do not believe that we ought to fill up the Record with extracts of testimony taken before the various committees of the House back yonder in 1900, because it was agreed in the Committee on Agriculture that the question of wholesomeness did not enter into this proposition, and I do not think it is quite fair that the gentleman should burden the Record with a lot of things that have passed out of the public mind in regard to the wholesomeness of the article. Everybody concedes that now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] object?

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to say in reply to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] that I have not injected this into the controversy. The letters have been sent out by Members of Congress, and that is why the matter is here. I do not propose to print a single word, with the exception of what is in the hearing, except two letters, one resolution, which refers to the Retail Merchants' Association, and also the statement prepared and presented to the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman has evidently spoken over five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman extending his remarks in the manner provided, but I do not believe the gentleman ought to put in the Record testimony taken in 1900. To that part of his request I make objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then I will leave that out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] object to the gentleman from Iowa incorporating certain matter in the Record?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to object to the insertion of the documents.

Mr. LEVER. I wish it understood, then, that I do not make the objection. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There was a motion made to strike out the paragraph. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

37. Gums: Amber, and amberoid unmanufactured, or crude gum, $1 per pound; arabic, one-half of 1 cent per pound; camphor, crude, natural, 3 cents per pound; camphor, refined and synthetic, 5 cents per pound; chicle, 20 cents per pound; gum copal, one-half of 1 cent per pound; gum resin, 10 per cent ad valorem; dextrine, burnt starch or British gum, dextrine substitutes, and soluble or chemically treated starch, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound; gum Kauri and damar, and lac, crude, seed, button, and stick, 1 cent per pound; lac dye, and shell, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, by striking out of paragraph 37, with the heading "Gums," from lines 5 to 7, the following:

"Amber, and amberoid unmanufactured, or crude gum, $1 per pound; arabic, one-half of 1 cent per pound; camphor, crude, natural, 3 cents per pound."

And by striking out from lines 9 and 10 the following: "gum copal, one-half of 1 cent per pound; gum resin, 10 per cent ad valorem."

And by striking out, from lines 13, 14, and 15, the words "gum Kauri and damar, and lac, crude, seed, button, and stick, 1 cent per pound; lac dye, and shell, 1½ cents per pound."

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, these articles are now all on the free list. In my opinion they should remain there. Most of them are raw materials and many of them are used in the manufacture of varnish and linoleum. They are not produced in this country, and the imposition of a duty upon them would simply increase the cost of manufactured products, such as floor oilcloth, cork carpets, and linoleum.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that the consuming public might not take kindly to a revision upward on an article so universally used in the homes of the laboring people as oilcloth floor covering, which could hardly be listed among the luxuries. The only beneficiary of such upward revision would be the United States Treasury. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these gums are imported in very large quantities and are absolutely essential in the manufacture and preparation of varnishes and some of the paints. They are all now on the free list. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] should prevail, they would remain on the free list under existing law.

The pending bill proposes to put them upon the dutiable list. It is an exemplification of the principles of the Democratic Party that it proposes to put a tariff upon crude materials, non-competitive in character, necessary for the maintenance of our own industries, while at the same time it proposes to reduce the tariff on the manufactured and refined articles themselves. We import to the extent, probably, of $10,000,000 worth under this paragraph of articles now on the free list; $10,000,000 worth.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] proposes to put them all on the dutiable list, every one of them an article which comes into contact with every citizen every day of the year; to take them off the free list and put them on the dutiable list under the claim that the country had placed his party in power in order to make a downward revision of the tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is an upward revision of the tariff on this schedule, prepared by the distinguished gentleman from New York. More than $40,000,000 worth of articles now on the free list this bill proposes to place upon the dutiable list; articles which come to us all the time, from varnishes to drugs, all through the bill; essential things in the maintenance of our industries and our own comfort. These gentlemen take these things off the free list, where we placed them, and put them on the dutiable list, under the pretense that they are revising the tariff downward. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Tell us what is to become of the ultimate consumer under this arrangement, if you please.

Mr. MANN. Well, the ultimate consumer has been lost since Mr. Boutell went to Switzerland. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, it was another distinguished gentleman from Chicago who invented the phrase, "ultimate consumer"; but even at that, Chicago does not seem to be entirely clear as to what the ultimate consumers use. I should gather from the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that his constituents are in the habit of consuming gum kauri and damar and amberoid. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] As a matter of fact, these gums are the constituent materials in the making of varnish, and what the consuming public uses is the varnish from which they are made.

Now, we have very carefully reduced the rates of taxation upon varnish, so that the manufacturer shall not unload upon the public the tax that we are laying on the manufacturer. The time has come to put an end to this school of economics whereby people are taught to look upon a tariff as a benefit. Taxation is not a benefit, but a burden, and now we are going to place upon the manufacturers their share of the burden. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. We rest our case on that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

38. Indigo, indigo extracts or pastes, and indigo carmined, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, line 16, by striking out the word "indigo" where it first appears.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the amount of indigo that will be needed on the Democratic side in November next I suggest that it be put on the free list.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, indigo is now on the free list. If my amendment prevails, it will be left on the free list. The Democrats propose to place it on the dutiable list in the interest of the washerwomen of the country, who use it in every household.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have really been led to believe that the charge leveled by the gentleman from Alabama at the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct, namely, that he is talking about what he does not understand. Indigo which is carried here is not the material that the washerwomen use. If the gentleman from Illinois would consult his better half, she would tell him that her washerwomen have not reached the state of high education which would enable them to make use of this very highly finished and highly developed coal-tar product. What the washerwomen do use is a bluing made from ultramarine blue, or wash blue, containing ultramarine, upon which we have reduced the rate of taxation from 3 cents a pound, which equals 25 per cent ad valorem, to 20 per cent ad valorem. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They also make use somewhat of aniline blues, which we have reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. They also make use of soluble blues from Prussian blues, the duty on which we have reduced from 30 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. It is easy to make such a statement as the gentleman from New York has just made, but indigo is used in the manufacture of bluing which the washerwomen use and which is used for washing, the gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding. He has the same information on this subject that he had about section 25 of paragraph 4982 of the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

40. Iodine: Crude, 10 cents per pound; resublimed, 15 cents per pound; potassium iodide, 20 cents per pound; iodoform, 25 cents per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, line 19, by striking out of line 19, after the heading "Iodine," the following: "Crude, 10 cents per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, crude iodine is now on the free list, and will remain on the free list if this amendment is adopted. Gentlemen on that side of the aisle propose to place it on the dutiable list. That is not in the interest of anybody. It ought to remain on the free list, as it is the basis of much of the antiseptic surgery which we have in these modern days.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I will call his attention to the fact that upon iodine, resublimed, potassium iodide, and iodoform, which are the articles used by the consuming public, we have reduced the rates of duty, but we have placed a small revenue tax upon the crude material.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

41. Leaves, roots, and spices: Buchu leaves, 10 cents per pound; coca leaves, 10 cents per pound; gentian, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; licorice root, unground, fifteen one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound; sarsaparilla root, 1 cent per pound; all the foregoing in a crude state, and not advanced in value or condition by refining, grinding, or other process; cassia buds, cassia, and cassia vera; cinnamon and cinnamon chips; ginger root, unground and not preserved or candied; nutmegs; pepper, black or white; capsicum or red pepper, or cayenne pepper; and clove stems, 1 cent per pound; cloves, 2 cents per pound; pimento, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound; sage, one-half of 1 cent per pound; mace, 8 cents per pound; mustard, ground or prepared, in bottles or otherwise, 6 cents per pound; all other spices not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out of paragraph 41, pages 10 and 11, the following:

"Licorice root, unground, fifteen one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound; sarsaparilla root, 1 cent per pound; all the foregoing in a crude state, and not advanced in value or condition by refining, grinding, or other process; cinnamon and cinnamon chips; ginger root, unground and not preserved or candied; nutmegs; pepper, black or white; capsicum or red pepper, or cayenne pepper; and clove stems, 1 cent per pound; cloves, 2 cents per pound; pimento, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound; mace, 8 cents per pound."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it allowable under the Democratic caucus rule for any Member except a Member on the Democratic side to offer an amendment? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the original paragraph, that portion of the paragraph which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered an amendment and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MANN. I am entitled to have my amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, by striking out in lines 3 to 7 the words:

"Cassia buds, cassia, and cassia vera; cinnamon and cinnamon chips"; and "nutmegs; pepper, black or white; capsicum or red pepper, or cayenne pepper; and clove stems, 1 cent per pound; cloves, 2 cents per pound."

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Cassia buds, cassia, and cassia vera; cinnamon and cinnamon chips"; and "nutmegs; pepper, black or white; capsicum or red pepper, or cayenne pepper; clove stems and cloves, all the foregoing, when ground, 2 cents per pound."

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the articles mentioned in the amendment I have offered here, under the Payne-Aldrich bill, are on the free list. These articles are used almost exclusively in the preparation of foodstuffs. They are used almost exclusively in the preparation of those things which may be included in the necessities of life. If that is the case, it seems that it becomes the duty of those gentlemen who were elected, like myself, on this side of the House, and who said to the people that they were in favor of the reduction of any duties which affected the necessities of life, that we were opposed to placing the necessities of life on the dutiable list, to vote for this amendment.

The Democratic platform of 1908 specifically said that "reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life." For one I went to the people of my district upon that proposition, and I know that there are a good many on this side of the House who did likewise. I believe that the people took us at our word and elected us because we said that and because they trusted us.

Further than that, from a Democratic standpoint, it seems to me that the placing of these particular articles upon the dutiable list is going to be one of the most dangerous things that can confront the Democratic Party in this coming campaign, because from every store, from every merchant at the crossroads, from every merchant in every village, town, borough, and city all over this land, there will go up a cry that the duty has been placed on these articles of common use by the Democratic Party, and that the Democratic Party, in placing these household necessities on the dutiable list, was not sincere in its pledges, and these merchants consequently will say to the consumer that they are compelled to raise the price. [Applause on the Republican side.] From hundreds of households all over the country that cry will ascend, and the Democratic Party will suffer.

I submit that the gentleman on the other side of this House, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, did not understand my position, but the Democratic Party has always been governed by rules, and the Democratic Party consistently stands and abides by those rules. At the Democratic caucus, I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio, I made a statement similar to the one I have made here, and in addition I said that I had pledged the people of my district to oppose anything that would increase the cost of the necessities of life, and the other members of the caucus, under the rules of the caucus, absolved me from supporting this paragraph in the bill. I am performing what I consider to be a conscientious duty and at the same time fulfilling my pledge to the people of my district. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, cassia, cinnamon, nutmegs, black and white pepper, clove stems are now free of duty when unground. The amendment I have offered proposes to leave the unground spices on the free list instead of putting them on the dutiable list. It can not be claimed that putting a duty on these will not affect the price to the consumer. Everyone knows better than that. It is taxing not only the breakfast table, but the dinner table and the supper table, without any excuse whatever.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, according to the report of the committee, there were 23,193,416 pounds of black or white pepper imported in the year 1911, and if this duty should go into effect about $171,230 in revenue will be collected on this household commodity as the result. It is but a single instance of placing upon the dutiable list under this bill the commodities that are consumed in the households of this country that are now on the free list. The inconsistencies of this bill were ably discussed in an editorial that appeared in the Washington Post of last Sunday, February 18, and I ask that it be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

FLAWS IN THE CHEMICAL BILL.

The chemical schedule is seen to be punctuated with "jokers" the closer it is subjected to scrutiny. It is doubtful if a bill ever before emerged from committee and caucus so utterly unlike what its sponsors claimed for it. The statement that the Ways and Means Committee had been supplied by the Tariff Board with data to work on is denied, the fact being that the Tariff Board has not taken up the chemical schedule, and consequently could not have had anything to give the committee.

So far from reducing the average rates of the Payne law 31½ per cent, as asserted in the report, the bill actually increases the present rates to the extent of 20 per cent. This was made possible by the committee choosing to ignore the duty imposed on the many articles taken off the free list and made dutiable. The articles thus switched from free trade to high protection aggregate $40,000,000 in imported value. It was from this source the committee has derived the idea that the revenues will be increased by upward of $3,000,000, but dealers and manufacturers who find fault say that the new rates will shut out the bulk of such imports, and that the Government's gain will be much less than the amount claimed.

The critics are convulsed with laughter over the discovery that New York and Pennsylvania interests will be hard hit by reductions in protected articles, but that New England, which the tinkers say is over-protected now, will benefit largely. As being another stroke of genius in juggling with the schedules, it is noted that while low duties are imposed on raw materials the duty is cut on manufactured chemicals, whereby the manufacturer is hit both ways.

A tariff bill that provokes protests from consumers, dealers, and manufacturers alike must be prolific of "jokers" in a rare degree, and fairly deserves the verdict of the paint trade, that it is the crudest attempt to get at so-called evils that any legislature has ever made.

Finally, it is observed that the House committee estimates that imports of chemicals now made subject to duty will be larger than they are when admitted free of duty, but why cavil at a little thing like that? What have facts to do with tariff revision, anyway?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Gregg] states that the Democratic Party is pledged to reduce taxes on the necessities of life. The Democratic Party is pledged to write a tariff for revenue only and to make the burdens of taxation fall as lightly as possible upon the necessities of life and more heavily upon the luxuries and matters of that kind. In writing this bill we have largely reduced the taxes on oils, paints, medicines, and many of the real necessities of life. We can not run this Government without levying taxes, and the Democratic Party has never claimed that it could; but we contend that the taxes that are levied should be levied for the benefit of the Government and not unduly for the benefit of special interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have reduced the taxes on the necessities of life. To accomplish that result, and not make the Government revenues suffer, we have had to levy taxes somewhere else. In every instance where we have levied a tax where a tax was not levied before, we have levied it solely for the purpose of revenue, and in no respect for the purpose of protection, because those taxes have been levied entirely upon noncompetitive articles, articles where there can not be any protection, no matter what tax we put upon them, and the Government gets the benefit of the tax levied.

As to the particular articles in this paragraph, the Republican Party levies a tax of 2½ cents a pound upon red pepper, but puts black pepper on the free list, and why? Because red pepper is produced in this country, is a competitive article, and the Republican Party puts what was clearly a prohibitive tax upon it. We have reduced the tax on red pepper from 2½ cents a pound to 1 cent a pound, and to make that reduction we have classed black pepper with red pepper.

For the purpose of protection the policy of the Republican Party has always been to put on the free list noncompetitive articles so that you might put a higher rate of taxation on competitive articles and force the American people to pay a double tax—one at the customhouse and one at the office of special interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In this bill we have reduced the tax on mustard. To make up for it we have put a small tax on other articles. The gentleman complains about the tax put on cinnamon and spices. Those are entirely noncompetitive articles, and it is a tax levied solely for the purpose of revenue, and no man can challenge that statement.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have only five minutes and I do not want to ask for an extension of time. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. In the case of cinnamon, the import price, as shown by the customhouse report, is 9 cents a pound. The retail price is 25 cents a pound. There is ample room to pay 10 per cent of 9 cents a pound, less than 1 cent a pound, and yet not hand it down to the ultimate consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I understood that the amendment which I offered was an amendment to perfect language which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania strikes out a part of that paragraph, the same as does the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out a considerable portion of the paragraph. My amendment was to strike out a portion of the language which is proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. No; I offer mine as an amendment to perfect language in the paragraph which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out. I understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed to strike out all of the paragraph beginning with the word "licorice," in line 24, page 10, down to lines 9 or 10, on page 11. I am not particular when the amendment is voted upon, except that if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is voted upon first, and is voted down, I do not want then to be cut out from a vote upon my amendment and told that it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. The Chair thinks the gentleman's amendment has precedence.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 49, noes 63.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. HARRISON, to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 70.

So the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, by striking out of paragraph 41 the following: "Buchu leaves, 10 cents per pound"; "gentian, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; licorice root, unground, fifteen one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound; sarsaparilla root, 1 cent per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these articles are now all on the free list. They are all crude materials. The bill proposes to place them upon the dutiable list. My amendment, if it prevails, will leave them upon the free list, where they belong.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the debate of yesterday I stated at length the committee's reasons for putting a tax upon these materials. Buchu and gentian are largely materials of the manufacture of patent medicines of very doubtful value. Licorice root goes into the manufacture of licorice which is used chiefly in connection with chewing tobacco. It is believed that these articles are a proper subject of taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

42. Lemon juice, lime juice, and sour orange juice, all the foregoing containing not more than 2 per cent of alcohol, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, lines 13, 14, and 15, by striking out the following: "42. Lemon juice, lime juice, and sour orange juice, all the foregoing containing not more than 2 per cent of alcohol, 10 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these juices are now all on the free list. If my amendment prevails they will remain on the free list. The bill proposes to place them upon the dutiable list. Under the pretense of a downward revision of the tariff they take articles from the free list and place them on the dutiable list in order to revise the tariff downward. When they are on the free list they are as far downward as they can get.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, we are enabled to revise the tariff downward upon many of the necessities of life contained in this bill. In order to do that we have had to distribute the tax elsewhere and we have placed a tax upon articles covered by this paragraph because they are chiefly used in the making of drinks for soda-water fountains and are therefore a proper subject for taxation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

44. Lime, citrate of, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, line 19, by striking out the following:

"44. Lime, citrate of, 1 cent per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] a moment ago stated that the juices in paragraph 42 which I moved to strike out were mainly used at the soda-water fountains and ought to pay a tax. The fact is that these juices are mainly used for harmless drinks, instead of encouraging people to drink alcoholic liquors. The gentleman proposes to increase the tax on the harmless drinks, under the pretense that you can afford to tax these harmless drinks, but it is not proposed, and I presume will not be proposed, to increase the tax on any beverages that contain alcohol. When the gentleman endeavors to strike down the soda-water fountains or the other harmless drinks of the country the gentleman does not understand that a great majority of the young people of the country will have some kind of drink beside merely water, and it may be a question whether, when the gentleman increases the cost of the soda-water fountain and other drinks of that character, he does not compel many a young man to an indulgence in alcoholic beverages. Now, I move to strike out citrate of lime, placing it on the dutiable list, and restore it where it belongs, to the free list, where it is now. They propose to put a high tax on these innocent drinks; we are in favor of maintaining them on the free list.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the tax of 1 cent per pound on citrate of lime, it is calculated, is equal to 7 per cent ad valorem, which is what the gentleman from Illinois calls a very high tax. At this rate, it is estimated, we will receive $44,000 a year. Citrate of lime is used solely in the making of citric acid.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

45. Magnesia: Calcined, 3½ cents per pound; carbonate of, precipitated, 1½ cents per pound; sulphate of, or Epsom salts, one-tenth of 1 cent per pound; magnesite, calcined, not purified, $1 per ton.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, lines 23 and 24, by striking out the following: "Magnesite, calcined, not purified, $1 per ton."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this magnesite is now on the free list. My amendment, if it prevails, will leave it there. The bill places it upon the dutiable list.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the rate of $1 per ton was placed on calcined magnesite for the sole purpose of raising revenue. This is an ad valorem equivalent of less than 9 per cent, and it is calculated it will produce $89,000 revenue. It is used solely in the making of certain pigments and paints, upon the finished products of which we have reduced the duty so that this tax can not be unloaded upon the consumer. All the other articles under the head of magnesia, such as carbonate of magnesia, sulphate of magnesia, and Epsom salts, have been reduced from about 50 per cent to 25 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

46. Menthol, 50 cents per pound.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the committee, and more especially the Ways and Means Committee, to a matter that is not immediately pertinent to the bill under consideration, but which is a tariff proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall be compelled to make a point of order against any discussion not in order if it is the intention to finish this bill to-night. Otherwise I have no objection.

Mr. HELM. I am not going to talk about anything other than a tariff matter. It is not, however, pertinent to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not determine yet as to whether the remarks of the gentleman are in order or not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has already stated. It is not necessary for the determination. In other words, I do not wish to be cut off from consideration of matters in the bill, when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has already announced that he would not consent to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects to anything not connected with the bill under consideration.

Mr. HELM. I am very sorry the gentleman objects to my using only five minutes of the time. It is a matter, I believe, that will be of very considerable interest.

Mr. MANN. In raising any question about it I am only following the example of the gentleman from Alabama, who stated a while ago that he would object to anything of that kind.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to speak for five minutes, regardless of the discussion of the matter before the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HELM. I wish to thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] for his kindness.

Mr. Chairman, I preface my statement by saying that it is well known that a portion of our Army and Navy is quartered and stationed in the Philippine Islands. It is there to guarantee to the Filipinos a stable government. They are an insurance policy for the island. Except for our Army being there there would not be a stable government. Under existing laws we are compelled to pay tariff duties on supplies that are taken into the Philippine Islands for the support and maintenance of the Army. We are affording them, precisely stating it, an insurance, and we are compelled to pay the premium on that insurance. Q. M. Gen. Aleshire in the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department stated that this Government had been compelled to pay $25,000 duty on some boats needed for the use of the Army, and that we have paid in eight months of 1910, $48,568 on subsistence that was carried to the Philippine Islands for the purpose of maintaining the portion of our Army there.

Now, I submit that this is a double tax on our Treasury. The Philippine Islands are a burden; they are a menace to our Government. They are the greatest element of danger to our Government, and it is a fact that we have to maintain a portion of our Army and a portion of our Navy there, and then have to pay a tariff duty to the Philippine Government on the supplies that we are compelled to take there in order to maintain them. I submit to the Committee of the Whole, and especially to the Committee on Ways and Means, that it is eminently proper that some speedy act should be taken to relieve our Treasury from this unjust burden. If we are going to furnish the Filipinos a stable governmental insurance, they should at least pay a portion of the premium on that insurance.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

50. Oils, expressed: Alizarin assistant, sulphoricinoleic acid, and ricinoleic acid, and soaps containing castor oil, any of the foregoing in whatever form, and all other alizarin assistants and all soluble greases used in the processes of softening, dyeing, or finishing, not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 15 per cent ad valorem; castor oil, 20 cents per gallon; coconut oil, palm oil, palm-kernel oil, and soya-bean oil, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; olive oil rendered unfit for use as food or for any but mechanical or manufacturing purposes, by such means as shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury and under regulations to be prescribed by him, three-eighths of 1 cent per pound; flaxseed and linseed oil, raw, boiled, or oxidized, 13 cents per gallon; poppy-seed oil, raw, boiled, or oxidized, rapeseed oil, and peanut oil, 10 cents per gallon; hempseed oil and Chinese-nut oil, 5 cents per gallon; almond oil, sweet, 5 cents per pound; mace oil, 8 cents per pound; sesame or sesamum seed or bean oil, 1½ cents per pound; olive oil, not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 20 per cent ad valorem; olive oil, in bottles, jars, kegs, or other packages containing less than 5 gallons each, 30 cents per gallon; all other expressed oils and all combinations of the same, not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 12, line 25, and page 13, line 1, by striking out the following: "Coconut oil, palm oil, palm-kernel oil, and soya-bean oil, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound"; and insert in lieu thereof the following: "refined, deodorized coconut oil, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, crude coconut oil—that is, coconut oil not refined or deodorized—is now on the free list. Palm oil, palm-kernel oil, and soya-bean oil are also now on the free list. We import very large quantities of these oils, which are largely used in the manufacture of soap.

My amendment, if it prevails, will leave these articles on the free list. The bill proposes to transfer all of them to the dutiable list and add a considerable expense to the people on these noncompetitive articles used in the manufacture of soap and other articles that are absolutely essential to Republican homes. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When the gentleman uses the word "soap" does he mean a very expensive, highly perfumed soap, or does he mean just an ordinary soap?

Mr. MANN. I mean the plain soap. Much of it would be a plain toilet soap, which, under the provisions of this bill, has a high tariff placed upon it, possibly a protective measure. Maybe that is compensatory. We have heard a great deal about compensatory tariffs. At any rate it will increase the cost to the consumer. I know very well that it is not a matter of great interest on that side of the House. They consider all soap an unnecessary luxury. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But with us it is a necessity, and we protest. [Applause on the Republican side.] We protest against putting a tariff on the raw material of which soap is made, on the one hand, and against increasing the tariff on plain toilet soap, on the other hand. We pay the bills. We ought to be consulted, although we have not been. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that some Republican households need a very great deal of soap. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. We use a great deal, too. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The proposition on this bill to tax the noncompetitive products which are known as coconut oil, palm oil, and palm-nut oil, the purest form of revenue taxation, at the low rate of 3 to 4 per cent, is an endeavor to make the very wealthy soap manufacturers of the United States bear their share of the tariff burdens. At the same time we have reduced, not increased, the duties upon soap itself, the statement of the gentleman from Illinois to the contrary notwithstanding.

He has fallen into a misapprehension about the rates of taxation upon soap, due to the fact that we have reclassified the soap paragraph at the express wish of the New York custom-house authorities, and we have compressed the term "fancy or perfumed soaps" into the term "toilet soaps." The error of the gentleman from Illinois consists in not know the fact that there are no toilet soaps to-day into the manufacture of which perfumes do not enter, for the simple reason that perfumes are essential to offset the disagreeable odors of the constituent oils. We have placed a small tax upon some of the materials of manufacture of these high-grade toilet soaps and at the same time cut down the rates of duty on the finished products, so that the manufacturers will not be able to unload their tax upon the public in the form of higher prices.

At the same time it is only fair to say that this bill contains tariff cuts which more than offset to the soap manufacturers the duty of 3 or 4 per cent which is placed on oils. The second most important ingredient in the manufacture of soap is caustic soda, which is cut from one-half of a cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent; and the next is silicate of soda, which is cut from three-eighths of a cent a pound to one-eighth of a cent; and likewise similar reductions on many other materials that enter into the manufacture of soap have been made in like proportions, as I explained in my remarks yesterday.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York is very free with his assertions, but erroneous in his logic and in his facts. I read from the existing tariff law: "Fancy or perfumed toilet soap" on the dutiable list. "Fancy or perfume toilet soap." The gentleman says that he has condensed the expression "fancy and perfumed soaps" into "toilet soaps." But that is not so. The gentleman is mistaken. The reading of the existing law is "fancy and perfumed toilet soap," the word "toilet" still being in the expression. Now, if the New York Customhouse have asked the gentleman to strike out "fancy and perfumed" it is because they have had trouble in determining between a toilet soap which was not fancy and perfumed and those which were fancy and perfumed. If there had been no difficulty in distinguishing between the two classes of soaps, there would be no question in the New York Customhouse.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The difficulty is that all toilet soaps are perfumed, and that the term "fancy or perfumed" toilet soap was so indefinite that no other grade of soap could get in cheaper. It is in the interest of cheaper soap that the change was made.

Mr. MANN. Oh, pshaw! If all toilet soaps were fancy or perfumed, this expression would have let in all soap. There is another provision of the law, governing soaps that are not fancy or perfumed. Now they propose to combine the two in this provision, and to increase what is now 20 per cent to 40 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. COOPER. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] that toilet soaps are always perfumed, I recall distinctly one very famous brand of soap, two varieties of imported soap made by the same manufacturer which are exactly alike, except that one is perfumed and the other is not, and it is marked "Pears soap unscented."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is quite the truth that we can not expect to get information relating to soaps from the Democratic side of the House. What do they know about soap? Nothing. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] could have allayed a great deal of the opposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to this paragraph if he had assured him that the duty here levied did not impose any duty on "soft soap," in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has been trying to deal very extensively. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I have no doubt that the gentleman from Illinois is very much opposed to levying a duty on "soft soap." The policy of his party has been against the increase of the number of articles on the free list. He has introduced amendment after amendment here, saying that if it was incorporated in the bill he would not vote for the bill after such amendment had been adopted, clearly showing his efforts have only been "soft-soaping" methods, for the purpose of deceiving the people.

What does the gentleman mean by undertaking to increase the free list, when it is against the policy of his party, if it is not an attempt to soft soap the people as to his real position and that of his party, and when he intends, as he has said, to vote against it? As its leader, does he mean to convey the idea that his party has changed its policy and now opposes the policy of protection?

Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to reduce the taxation of the American people. The Republican Party three years ago passed a bill that levied a duty of 46.76 per cent on every dollar's worth of the over 4,000 dutiable articles in common use by the consumers of this country. Think of it! People may groan under local taxation which levies 2 or 3 cents on the dollar, but here is a Federal taxation enacted by the Republican Party that levies a duty of 46½ per cent on every dollar's worth of the dutiable articles purchased by the American people for consumption. [Applause.] Such was the burden it imposed on the American people for the benefit of the special interests. The Republican Party then had an opportunity to increase the free list, but it refused to do it. It could have put the necessities of life on the free list, but it refused to do it. They broke their platform pledge to the people to revise the tariff downward by revising it upward. The people repudiated them at the first opportunity when they got to the ballot box by turning out the Republican majority in this House and putting in a very large Democratic majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"Soft soap" has been and is a commodity largely in use by the Republican Party on this subject, as its course has shown. It has been "soft soaping" the American people for many years on the tariff, and by so doing it has extorted the fruits of their toil and exacted from the ultimate consumers unreasonable prices to swell the unearned profits of the beneficiaries of the protective system.

It tried the "soft-soaping" process to reconcile the people to the passage of the Payne bill, by which the taxes of the American people were raised in violation of party promises; but the process failed. It had lost its palliating effect, and the result was it was turned out of power in this House and now is threatened to be driven from power in the other branches of the Government. The Republicans now desire that "soft soap" be free of all duty, in order to make it as cheap as possible; because, in order to avoid defeat at the coming election, it will need larger quantities than usual to "soft soap" the voters if that party can secure the suffrages of the outraged consumers who have suffered so much by its high protective policies.

Mr. Chairman, for years it has been "soft soaping" the voters of this country on this question, but they now wisely refuse to be "soft soaped" longer; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can disabuse his mind if he thinks he can longer "soft soap" the people as he is now and has been trying to do throughout the course of this tariff legislation. The people are too wise to be longer "soft soaped" on this question. They have felt its effect and know its burden to them and its benefit to the beneficiary and its imposition upon the bone and sinew of the land.

The people want substance and not "soft soap." They want bread and not a stone. They want duties reduced and equalized, in order that the real earners of wealth may have the benefit of their toil as a reward for their industry.

Now the Republican Party wants soft soap on the free list—to go back and undertake to soft soap the people, in order that they may return a majority to this House at the coming election. It will require more than soft soap for them to succeed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A voice from the people has just reached me in the shape of a message from St. Louis, Mo., which reads as follows:

ST. LOUIS, Mo., February 20, 1912.

Hon. R. BARTHOLDT,
Washington, D. C.:

I earnestly request your prompt cooperation in opposing new tariff schedule in regard to paints, oils, and chemicals, which seriously threatens the general agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests of this State, as well as the whole country, and earnestly protest the passage without full and complete investigation and hearing.

NORRIS B. GREGG.

The answer to this message is, Mr. Chairman, that the reunited Republican Party will unanimously oppose this bill and protest against its passage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the second last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I will speak against the amendment. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph deals with the tariff on linseed oil. I desire to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee, especially that part of the committee who had charge of drafting this bill, upon their wisdom in making a reduction from 15 cents a gallon to 13 cents a gallon. But, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that it is well known that there is a trust to-day controlling the manufacture and sale of linseed oil in America, I would be very glad to see a further reduction, making the rate 10 instead of 13 cents a gallon.

Mr. Chairman, about 100,000,000 bushels of flaxseed are produced annually in the world, selling, perhaps, at an average of $1 per bushel. A capital of $100,000,000 would be sufficient to buy up all the flaxseed in the world indefinitely and form a trust upon that article, thereby controlling the manufacture, output, and sale of linseed oil. If aided by a high protective duty it would be a very easy proposition, and for this reason, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be safeguards thrown around the people of this country to protect them against the extortion of the trusts. A low duty on all trust-made articles would materially interfere with their plans and tend to bring about competition.

On December 5, 1898, shortly after the passage of the Dingley bill, the American Linseed Co. was organized. It took over the National Linseed Oil Co., then in process of formation, and 43 other oil-producing plants in this country, controlling about 85 per cent of the production of the linseed oil in America. Since that time other linseed-oil plants have been taken over by this trust, making in all 47 different plants under one set of directors, with a capital stock of $50,000,000, which, in my opinion, control the manufacture, output, and sale of linseed oil. The following companies form this trust:

AMERICAN LINSEED CO.

Incorporated under the laws of New Jersey December 5, 1898, to consolidate a number of independent mills with those of the National Linseed Oil Co., then in process of reorganization.

Business: To manufacture American and Calcutta linseed oil, raw, boiled, and refined varnish, oil cake, oil meal, and crushed flaxseed.

The capital stock authorized consists of $25,000,000 7 per cent non-cumulative preferred and $25,000,000 common stock. Outstanding, $16,750,000 preferred and $16,750,000 common. Par value, $100. In 1904 the mortgages had all been paid off, no dividends having been paid on the preferred stock since 1900. The $6,000,000 of 5 per cent gold notes were paid off in August, 1901.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. With pleasure, for a question.

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman not think that the Linseed Oil Trust, as well as the Standard Oil Trust, which I understand makes an adulteration which is sold as linseed oil, should join together in congratulating the Democratic side of this House that the reduction of the tax on linseed oil is only 2 cents per gallon in this bill?

Mr. FOWLER. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas that the United Lead Co. in the same year, 1898, was organized for the purpose of controlling the production of white lead in America. It is composed of 19 leading lead plants in this country. I understand that the American Linseed Co. and the United Lead Co. have since united under one directorate and one management, the majority of the stock thereof being controlled by the Rockefellers.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; I quite agree with the gentleman about that, but what I ask him is if he does not think it is a subject for congratulation in these days of tariff revision that these great trusts should escape with a reduction of only 2 cents per gallon on this important commodity?

Mr. FOWLER. I say to the gentleman from Kansas that I do not know what were the hearings before the committee—

Mr. COOPER. There were none.

Mr. FOWLER. The committee that framed this bill; but I am informed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] that it is because there is a tariff on flaxseed, which has varied in the past all the way from 20 cents per bushel to 30 cents per bushel, and that because of the further reason that the committee is not now dealing with flaxseed at this time they were reluctant to make sweeping reductions in the rate on linseed oil. But, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the Rockefeller interests have extended out so far and in so many different directions in this country and laid a heavy hand upon the various things which we must have in order to live, and inasmuch as this trust has laid such a heavy hand upon the humble homes of the people of the country, I believe that we ought to take the tariff off altogether and let these wrongdoers compete with the countries across the sea that produce linseed oil and white lead.

The following statement shows the companies which originally joined hands in forming the White Lead Trust:

THE UNITED LEAD CO.

Incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey in January, 1903, by interests affiliated with the American Smelting & Refining Co.; the latter a Guggenheim-Rockefeller property. The Whitney-Ryan and Standard Oil parties are also interested in the United Co.

The purpose of the company was to take over the various lead and linseed manufacturing plants controlled by the parties above named.

The following is a complete list of the concerns whose plants were taken over by the United Lead Co.:

James Robertson Lead Co., Baltimore, Md.
 The Omaha Shot & Lead Co., Omaha, Nebr.
 Northwestern Shot & Lead Works, St. Paul, Minn.
 Collier Shot Tower Works, St. Louis, Mo.
 Bailey & Farrell Shot Works, Pittsburgh, Pa.
 Markle Lead Works, St. Louis, Mo.
 Gibson & Price, Cleveland, Ohio.
 Le Roy Shot & Lead Works, New York City.
 Union Lead & Oil Works, Brooklyn, N. Y.
 Sportsman Shot Works, Cincinnati, Ohio.
 Chicago Shot Tower Co., Chicago, Ill.
 Hoyt Metal Co., St. Louis, Mo.
 Tatham & Bros., New York City.
 Raymond Lead Co., Chicago, Ill.
 E. W. Blatchford & Co., Chicago, Ill.
 Thomas W. Sparks, Philadelphia, Pa.
 Chadwick-Boston Lead Co., Boston, Mass.
 Lausten Lead Works, Chicago, Ill.
 McDougal White Lead Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Control of the Chadwick-Boston Lead Co. was effected on the basis of $125 of 5 per cent 40-year bonds for each of its $100 shares (total issue of stock, $800,000). The $251,000 first-mortgage 5 per cent sinking-fund bonds of the Chadwick company were not disturbed by the merger. There are no other underlying bonds.

Capital stock: Originally there was $15,100,000 stock, $100,000 of which was 7 per cent preferred, but in May, 1903, the issue was increased to $25,000,000; of the last-named amount $10,000,000 is 6 per cent cumulative preferred, the rest common stock. Par value of share, $100.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOWLER. I have only a little time, but I will be very glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the gentleman. I want to ask him if he thinks it ought to be put on the free list why he does not offer an amendment that would put it there, or, at least, reduce it to a point where he thinks it ought to go. I would be very glad to vote with the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will vote with the gentleman also.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a large quantity of flaxseed is produced in other countries. The Argentine Republic produces more than any other country in the world, producing from twenty to thirty million bushels annually. Uruguay produces from four to six million bushels annually; Russia, about eighteen to twenty million bushels annually; India, about sixteen to eighteen million bushels annually; and the United States produces annually from twenty to twenty-nine million bushels; England, France, and Germany produce but little, if any, and must look to these countries for supplies. Therefore our people are quite well supplied with the home product, as we import but little flaxseed, unless we have a short crop, which occurred in 1911, which was only a little over 14,000,000 bushels. Hence our revenue is slight, comparatively speaking, from our imports of flaxseed and its product, being now slightly over a half a million dollars. Until the duty on the flaxseed is regulated it would not be wise to make a radical reduction, but I agree with the gentleman that there would be much benefit come from his suggestion. I would be very glad to see the duty changed to 10 cents per gallon.

I am indebted to Mr. Ennis for the following table, which shows the world's flaxseed crop under average conditions for one year:

Countries.	Production.	Exports.	Consumption.	Imports.
United States	$26,000,000	$2,000,000	$24,100,000	$100,000
India	16,000,000	15,000,000	1,000,000	—
Russia	17,000,000	1,425,000	15,575,000	—
Argentina	30,000,000	29,500,000	1,500,000	—
Uruguay	5,000,000	4,800,000	200,000	—

Until about the year 1850 flax was raised in America for the fiber almost solely, but since that time it has been used for making linseed oil and is almost solely raised for that purpose in our country now. The following table shows the growth of flax raising in America:

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not like to object to the extension of my colleague's time on this side of the House, but I notified gentlemen on the other side that I would not consent to an extension of time—

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman reserve the right to object?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it is practicable to finish the bill to-night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope that we can get through to-night.

Mr. MANN. It undoubtedly would keep us until late, and if it does I would not be willing for everybody to leave and go home to dinner while we are considering the bill. I see no difficulty in practically finishing the bill to-night except voting, and let that go over. I would be willing, as far as I am concerned, to agree by unanimous consent, if that can be done, to postpone Calendar Wednesday until Saturday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the bill can be finished to-night. I would like to do so.

Mr. MANN. It can not be done without great inconvenience to Members. There is a presidential reception to-night. I am not going myself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Members who want to go, and expect to go—and there are Members on both sides—can find pairs.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose there will be a record vote on the bill, will there not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose so.

Mr. MANN. There will probably be several record votes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that if we can finish the reading of the bill to-night, and I may be allowed to move the previous question so that it can go over as unfinished business, I am willing to vote on the motion to recommit to-morrow morning.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it could come up as unfinished business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think it could come up as unfinished business.

Mr. JAMES. We might take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Why can not we have an agreement to transfer Calendar Wednesday until Saturday and see if anybody objects to it? Of course, it can not be done in committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think we can get through with the bill to-night if gentlemen will allow us to read the bill. We are nearly through the disputed items now.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have a number of amendments to offer, and we shall probably have at least two roll calls coming just at a time that is inconvenient to Members.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say with reference to roll calls that I am willing, when we reach that stage, to make an agreement with the gentleman that to-morrow morning we may have a two-thirds vote to dispense with Calendar Wednesday until the two votes are taken. I am willing to take those votes to-morrow morning.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether we can do that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We can do it by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we can dispense with Calendar Wednesday by a two-thirds vote. As far as I am concerned, I am willing under the circumstances to transfer it. I think we can transfer it without any difficulty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we transfer Calendar Wednesday, we would have to take up an appropriation bill to-morrow when we get through with this bill. I much prefer to try and finish the bill to-night. However, I do not want to inconvenience anybody on the record vote if we can arrange that. I am quite willing to take the gentleman's word about it if he will say that to-morrow morning he will see that we get a two-thirds vote to dispense with Calendar Wednesday until the vote is taken.

Mr. MANN. I will be quite willing to-morrow, under the circumstances, to cooperate with the gentleman in an effort to secure a two-thirds vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will say that when I move the previous question in the House to-night, I shall adjourn the House and take the final vote to-morrow morning.

Mr. MANN. I hope now that the gentleman from Alabama will give my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] his time; and take the chances on shutting off others hereafter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to make a precedent. If the gentleman will agree not to hold it against me as a precedent I will do so.

Mr. MANN. I shall not hold it as a precedent, because I think every gentleman in the House will now want to get through the bill as speedily as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] be extended for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if in extending his remarks in the Record he will not answer my question? I have no objection to the request. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MANN. Do I understand there is objection to the request of my colleague to extend his remarks in the Record?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen demanded the regular order, and that is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. JAMES. No; we were demanding the regular order against questions being put out of order; that is all.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen were demanding the regular order, and I hope they will withdraw that objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the debate on yesterday I suggested to the gentleman from Illinois who has just addressed the committee the reasons which actuated the committee in recommending a rate of 13 cents per gallon on linseed oil. The Dingley law taxed linseed oil 20 cents a gallon. The Payne law cut it down to 15 cents a gallon, and the Underwood bill makes a further cut to 13 cents a gallon, or an ad valorem equivalent of 19 per cent. At this rate we estimate we will receive $570,000 of revenue. It will thus be seen that linseed oil is one of the largest revenue producers in the oil list. But there was a further reason why we did not make a further reduction than from 15 to 13 cents per gallon, namely, because flaxseed, out of which this oil is made, is taxed at 25 cents per bushel in the agricultural schedule, which on the customhouse receipts last year made an ad valorem equivalent of 19 per cent; and in view of that we found it impossible at this time and in view of the revenue to make a further reduction on linseed oil.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. It being out of order to offer an amendment on this bill to reduce the tariff on flaxseed, and the gentleman stated that he maintained the tariff on flaxseed oil because he can not reduce the tariff on flaxseed, and it being out of order on the consideration of the agricultural schedule to reduce the tariff on linseed oil, how in the world will you ever make the bread and the molasses meet?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I can not answer the parliamentary question of the gentleman, but I will inform him I am in hopes we will soon present a revision of the agricultural schedule which contains flaxseed, and that revision will be a revision downward of the rates on flaxseed.

Mr. MANN. Very well—

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And I repudiate his suggestion that we have left a high rate on linseed oil, as we have reduced the rates of the Payne law on linseed oil.

Mr. MANN. You have reduced it less than 10 per cent—

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Fourteen per cent.

Mr. MANN. From 15 to 13 cents. Now, what great benefit will it be to the people of the country, as you say, to reduce the duty on flaxseed in the agricultural schedule when you can not then reduce the tariff on linseed oil?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have already reduced linseed oil to the fairest revenue point, and when we come to flaxseed we will reduce that, because in justice to the manufacturers of linseed oil it ought to be reduced.

Mr. MANN. And then will you come back with another chemical bill and reduce the tariff on linseed oil?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I thought the gentleman had enough of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I have quite enough of it, but under the rules you have adopted you can not reduce the tariff on both flaxseed and linseed oil at the same time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there a motion now pending on the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending on the paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. Offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

The CHAIRMAN. Offered by the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. NORRIS. That is the paragraph ending at line 19 on page 13?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEEDHAM, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, lines 1 to 5, by striking out the following:

"Olive oil rendered unfit for use as food or for any but mechanical or manufacturing purposes, by such means as shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury and under regulations to be prescribed by him, three-eighths of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this olive oil does not come in competition with olive oil produced in this country. Under the existing law olive oil rendered unfit for food comes in free of duty. It is used for manufacturing purposes. I propose by my amendment to leave that character of olive oil on the free list. The bill proposes to take it from the free list, where we placed it under the Payne bill, and put it on the dutiable list.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in taking denatured olive oil from the free list we have placed upon it a tax of three-eighths of a cent a pound, which is about 3 or 4 per cent ad valorem. There is no reason why, if we tax the olive oil which is used as a food of the poor people, we should not place a revenue tax upon the olive oil which is used by the manufacturer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 15: Strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if it should be adopted, would restore the rate upon olive oil in packages of less than 5 gallons to the rate which that article has borne both in the Dingley law and in the Payne law. The olive-oil industry in the State of California has been making progress since the enactment of the Dingley law, notwithstanding that the rate of 50 cents a gallon has only averaged about 33 per cent ad valorem—a very moderate protective duty. At the same time the importations of olive oil have been increasing enormously year by year. It is a remarkable coincidence that the rate fixed in this bill by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee is exactly the same rate as was requested by the importers when the Payne bill was under preparation before the Committee on Ways and Means.

We hear a good deal about special interests, but, in my opinion, the worst special interest of all is the importing interest, and it should not receive the same consideration at the hands of the American Congress that the domestic producers of this country should receive. The rate fixed in this bill is exactly the one asked by the importers, and will be found in the hearings, volume 4, page 3735. I have not the time to read it, but it ends by saying:

We therefore respectfully submit that a duty be made of 30 cents a gallon upon olive oil.

That is signed by the importing interests of the city of New York.

There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to bring before the House. For more than 20 years Democratic candidates for Congress in the State of California have been telling the voters of that State that the election of Democratic Members from California and of a Democratic Congress would not imperil the industries of that State. In view of the action of this Democratic House already taken, and the action yet to be taken, I am very curious to see the line of argument which Democratic candidates for Congress in California will follow in the coming campaign. In my opinion they will find it very difficult to convince the voters of that State that the industries of California have not been imperiled by the election of a Democratic House.

In addition to the direct competition of importers, we have to meet the adulterations of the imported olive oil. The imported article in many instances is composed of half cottonseed oil, and is not a pure product. Our olive-oil producers have been compelled from the very foundation of this industry to meet this secret and underhanded method of competition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I would like to have a minute longer in which to read an editorial from the Washington Post, which refers to the question of adulteration.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from California may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would regret, Mr. Chairman, to have to object to members of the committee going on, but they can extend their remarks in the Record.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Will the gentleman permit the editorial to be read? It will take only half a minute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not object. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk may read the editorial referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the Clerk read the editorial submitted by the gentleman from California. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A sample of the manner in which the House Democrats are looking after the interests of the people in their tariff-reduction bills is shown in the olive-oil item of the chemical schedule, just agreed upon. The present duty upon olive oil is 50 cents a gallon, or about 34 per cent ad valorem, which affords protection to domestic producers of pure olive oil and enables them to go ahead and build up a new industry. The new bill cuts this duty to 30 cents a gallon, or about 20 per cent ad valorem. This destroys the protection enjoyed by American producers and means the ruin of their business.

French and Italian olive oil is adulterated with cottonseed oil. American olive oil is absolutely pure. The pure-food law requires, of course, that imported oil shall be properly branded, but Dr. Wiley is authority for the statement that it is almost impossible to detect a blend of cotton seed with olive oil if the proportions are half and half. So heavy were the importations of cottonseed oil by French and Italian olive-oil manufacturers that the French Government quintupled the duty on cottonseed oil against the protest of the virtuous manufacturers who were adulterating their olive oil for American consumption. The increased cost of this adulterant and the duty on olive oil enabled the California producers of pure oil to build up a business.

The Democratic bill, if enacted into law, will destroy this business, and American consumers will be forced to use the foreign adulterated oil at prices fully as high as the perfectly pure oil now produced in California. Experience has shown that the consumer never benefits by a tariff reduction on such commodities. The middleman merely adds to his profits.

If the Senate should join with the House in passing this bill, the olive-oil producers will have to look to President Taft to save their industry from destruction. Other industries are in the same fix. The Democrats could not give Mr. Taft a better campaign weapon than to pass a tariff bill tearing down American industries and thereby enable him to veto it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my very good friend from California [Mr. NEEDHAM] has allowed himself to see specters of New York importers in the reductions made by the committee. Of course, I know that he and other prohibitive tariff advocates look upon that class of business men whom they call "importers" as the enemies of the Republic, but he must recognize that behind these people there is an enormous class of citizens of Mediterranean birth or descent, in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and elsewhere along our seaboard, where olive oil is the substitute for butter, and is largely consumed by those people. It is what they call "the poor man's food." The heretofore existing high rates on olive oil were put on simply to make these poor people on the eastern seaboard pay the freight rates on the California olive oil, so as to enhance the price of their food. That is the reason why the committee has reduced these rates. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, lines 8 and 9, by striking out the following: "and Chinese-nut oil."

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk a telegram, which I have just received, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 17, 1912.

Hon. W. J. BROWNING, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly protest against changes in duties on paints and oils proposed in new chemical schedule, especially duty on china wood oil, which would double cost of about 50 per cent of varnishes consumed.

JOHN LUCAS & CO.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, John Lucas & Co., whose office is in Philadelphia, Pa., have in Camden County, N. J., one of the largest paint manufactories in the United States. They own their own spur of railroad to the main line and their own freight and passenger stations, and they employ hundreds of hands. I hope this protest will be heeded.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there may be many more articles in the two paragraphs to which I have offered amendments to-day that should, by every right of reason, remain on the free list, but I have singled out only the articles which have been brought to my attention by several manufacturing firms—articles essential in the manufacture of necessities used in the homes of average American families. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to speak to that amendment?

Mr. MANN. I did want to speak a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, Chinese nut oil is now on the free list. We imported last year nearly 6,000,000 gallons of it at an expense of over $2,000,000. It is used in the manufacture of varnishes. It is very important that we should have the crude materials as cheaply as possible. The bill proposes to put a duty of 5 cents a gallon on this oil. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], if it prevails, will strike that out and leave it where it now is, on the free list.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill on page 13, line 6, by striking out the word "thirteen" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, in line 6, strike out the word "thirteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] told us of the Linseed Oil Trust a few moments ago and explained why it was that the tariff on this oil ought to be reduced even to the extent of putting it on the free list. I suggested to him at that time that he offer an amendment to reduce it; but while he is in favor of the reduction, and I presume his colleagues are, he did not offer an amendment to make a reduction.

The last Democratic national platform has a plank in it to the effect that the Democratic Party are in favor of putting the products of the trusts on the free list. Now, here is an opportunity to cut down the tariff on this product of the Linseed Oil Trust or to put it on the free list.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it a trust?

Mr. NORRIS. I am taking the word of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. SHERLEY. I am asking you.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. You are offering an amendment on that supposition?

Mr. NORRIS. I have given the gentleman the source of my information. I am taking the word of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], in whom I have the greatest confidence, given here as a Member on the floor of the House, that it is controlled by a trust, and the gentleman from Illinois is Democratic authority.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply wanted to ask, if it was a trust, what steps have been taken by the Department of Justice to dissolve the trust?

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman knows that he can not get the information from me, because I am not able to give information as to the course that would be taken by the present administration on that or anything else. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. For the moment I forgot that the gentleman was not a Republican. I thought he was. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman ought to continue to have that recollection that I am one of those Republicans who believe in the right kind of Republican doctrine; and I am informed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] that this product is controlled by a trust.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman be the right kind of a Republican, he seems to be in a tremendous minority.

Mr. NORRIS. I would rather be right and be in a minority than be wrong, with the gentleman from Kentucky, and be in a majority. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Paraphrasing a remark once made by a distinguished gentleman, the gentleman from Nebraska may find himself both wrong and in the minority.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be, and when I do I will be frank and honest enough to admit it just as soon as I am convinced of it.

Now, that is all outside of the question. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] says this is controlled by a trust. The entire Democratic Party have said, "We are in favor of making free the products of the trusts." Now, if you think more of your word and the good of the country than you do of the dictates of your party caucus you ought at least to vote for this amendment.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that if we reduce the tariff on this oil we ought to reduce the tariff on flaxseed, from which it is made. I concede that that may be a good argument, and that we could not offer an amendment here to reduce the duty on flaxseed, because it would not be germane to this bill and would be out of order.

Now, then, if that be true, then the country is between the devil and the deep sea, sure, because when we come to the schedule where flaxseed is included, and a motion is made to reduce the duty on it, they would say that if we reduce the duty on that we ought to reduce the duty on oil, and we can not make a motion to that effect on that bill, because it would be out of order. So what we ought to do—and I believe in schedule revision—is to reduce this tariff, and then, if it is necessary when we come to another schedule of the tariff, reduce the tariff on the product out of which it is made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I want to offer two amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this pending amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks that all debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the flaxseed which is used in America for making linseed oil is mostly produced in America. We produce annually from twenty to twenty-eight million bushels of flaxseed, and we manufacture most of that. Last year, or in 1910, we imported 5,000,000 bushels of flaxseed. We produced during the year 24,000,000 bushels, but we exported a part of what we had raised and a portion of what we had imported.

A bushel of flaxseed will make 2½ gallons of oil. There is now on flaxseed a duty of 25 cents a bushel. If the rate were reduced to 10 cents a gallon on linseed oil, that would leave the manufacturer of this article without any compensatory duty. Two and one-half times 10 cents is 25 cents, the same as is placed on a bushel of seed to-day. He would have nothing left except the flax cake, which is about 37 or 38 pounds to the bushel, and which sells from $20 to $80 a ton, and is used as cow feed, which is regarded as a most excellent and highly nutritious food.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], a gentleman whose course in this Hall was to a greater or less extent a pattern for me in my campaign last year, has done me more than honor by saying that he accepts as true my statement that this article is controlled by a trust, but I desire to say to the gentleman and to this House that I verily believe that there is a trust in the production of linseed oil and which controls the sale thereof. I want to thank him very kindly for his courtesy, but I want to say in reply that if the amendment which I would like to see passed is carried and the duty on the rates lowered to 10 cents a gallon, then it would, perhaps, require a corresponding reduction on the flaxseed itself.

North Dakota produces more flaxseed than all the rest of the United States. Minnesota, the two Dakotas, Wyoming, Washington, and Idaho practically produce the flaxseed of this country. I do not know what the gentlemen who come from those States think of a reduction of the tariff on flaxseed itself, but in my opinion the tariff could be lowered upon flaxseed with a great deal of consistency, and thereby give an opportunity to lower the tariff on linseed oil.

It would give the man in the country an opportunity to give his humble home a coat of whitewash made of lead and linseed oil instead of being made of lime. I highly favor it, because in my own town I have a humble home that I undertook to paint, and when I went to buy the oil at retail it was $1.25 a gallon, a price so enormous that I was not able to buy it, and for that reason my little home at Elizabethtown, Ill., is yet without a coat of paint. I would like to get an opportunity to paint that house.

Mr. BUTLER. How much oil did the gentleman require? We might get him a gallon. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that I never posed as a millionaire living in mansions one part of the year during the fashionable season and then hibernating in a dozen other places at seashores and summer resorts, residing in mansions which are costly enough for that of the king of any country in the world. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 8, by striking out the following:
"And peanut oil."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, peanut oil is now on the free list. This bill proposes to place it on the dutiable list at 10 cents per gallon. I do not know just how the gentleman drawing the bill has arrived at the tariff on the different oils. He proposes on coconut oil a tariff of one-quarter of 1 cent per pound; on poppy-seed oil and peanut oil, 10 cents per gallon; on Chinese nut oil, 5 cents per gallon; on almond oil, sweet, 5 cents per pound; on mace oil, 8 cents per pound; and there are various other provisions. All in this list are now on the free list. Peanut oil is a table article in different forms, used by people, certainly not of the richest class, because I use some of it myself, and I have no doubt that my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] also must occasionally use peanut oil. What is the reason for putting the highest rate of all in this list on peanut oil, which is now on the free list? What is the reason for transferring it from the free list at all to the dutiable list? It ought to be kept on the free list, where it is now, in the interest of the consumers of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, by striking out the following:
"Almond oil, sweet, 5 cents per pound; mace oil, 8 cents per pound; sesame or sesamum seed or bean oil, 1½ cents per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these oils are all on the free list now. If my amendment prevails, they will remain on the free list. The bill proposes to place them on the dutiable list at a rather high rate of duty. They are necessities in the families of the country, in the ordinary way they are used, and there is no excuse for placing them upon the dutiable list under any form of tariff legislation which endeavors to protect to any extent the industries of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the tax on almond oil, mace oil, sesame oil, as contained in the bill, and as proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, is a tax upon the materials used in manufacturing perfumes, cosmetics, and perfumed toilet soaps. To some extent also these oils are used in the manufacture of flavoring extracts, but it is not believed that the revenue duty placed upon these noncompetitive products will be a hardship upon the people who use any of these articles of manufacture.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

51. Oils, distilled and essential: Peppermint, 25 cents per pound; almond, bitter; anise or anise seed; bergamot; camomile; caraway; cassia; cinnamon; cedrat; citronella or lemon-grass; jasmine or jasmine; juniper; lavender; and aspic or spike lavender; lemon; limes; neroli or orange flower; orange; origanum, red or white; rosemary or anthos; attar of roses; thyme; and valerian; all the foregoing oils, and all fruit oils and essences, and essential and distilled oils and all combinations of the same, not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 20 per cent ad valorem; Provided, That no article containing alcohol shall be classified for duty under this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, lines 21 to 25, and page 14, line 1, by striking out the following words:

"Anise or anise seed; bergamot; camomile; caraway; cassia; cinnamon; cedrat; citronella or lemon-grass; jasmine or jasmine; juniper; lavender; and aspic or spike lavender; lemon; limes; neroli or orange flower; and origanum, red or white; rosemary or anthos; attar of roses; thyme; and valerian."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these oils are now all on the free list. They are used in the manufacture of perfumes and some of the common extracts.

Mr. BUTLER. Extracts of vanilla?

Mr. MANN. Lemon extracts. The bill proposes to place them upon the dutiable list at 20 per cent. My amendment proposes to leave them where they now are under the Payne law, on the free list. These go indirectly into every household. The gentleman proposes to tax what are no longer luxuries, but necessities—true, largely used by the gentler sex—

Mr. BUTLER. To anoint themselves.

Mr. MANN. The gentler sex who can not vote, but that is no excuse for putting them on the dutiable list. Some of them are used by the gentler sex to anoint themselves, it is true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests, and some of them are used to make the food they prepare for us a little pleasanter to eat.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the rates of duty upon the finished product, perfume, are retained in this bill at the same figure they were in the Payne law, which is about 70 per cent ad valorem, equivalent. In view of that fact it is believed that the imposition of a 20 per cent ad valorem tax upon the essential oils which are the raw material for the manufacture of perfume is one of the fairest revenue producers that could be found.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

54. Ambergris; enfleurage grease; musk, crude, in natural pods, and musk in the grain; civet, crude; all synthetic and essential oils and all other odoriferous substances or preparations suitable for the manufacture of perfumes or cosmetics, or flavoring extracts, not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, 20 per cent ad valorem; Provided, That no article containing alcohol shall be classified for duty under this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 15, lines 16 and 17, by striking out the following:
"Ambergris; enfleurage grease; musk, crude, in natural pods, and" and "civet, crude."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, these articles are now on the free list. If my amendment prevails, they will remain on the free list. This bill proposes to place them on the dutiable list at 20 per cent ad valorem, a high rate even if it were to pay a duty. They are crude materials, not competitive in character, of the same class to which I have already called attention.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman, I will simply call the attention of the committee to the fact that ambergris, enfleurage grease, musk, and civet are very expensive articles and should bear their fair share of the burdens of taxation. They were left upon the free list by the Republicans because they are noncompetitive articles. That is the very reason why we are placing them on the tax list. They are raw materials in the manufacture of perfumes.

Mr. HILL. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to paragraph 54, where a word is spelled wrong. It is spelled a-m-b-e-r-g-r-i-s in the bill and it ought to be a-m-b-e-r-g-r-i-s.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. As I read the bill it is a-m-b-e-r-g-r-i-s. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to it; it is simply a typographical error, which should be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend paragraph 54, in line 16, page 15, by inserting the letter "r" between the letters "e" and "g" in the first word, "ambegris," so that it will read "a-m-b-e-r-g-r-i-s."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

59. Chrome yellow, chrome green, and all other chromium colors in the manufacture of which lead and bichromate of potash or soda are used, in pulp, dry, or ground in or mixed with oil or water, 20 per cent ad valorem, but not less than 3 cents per pound.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I was called out of the Chamber when the paragraph just ahead of this was read, in relation to barytes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman wish to go back to a paragraph?

Mr. AUSTIN. If you please.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman to wait until we finish the bill, and I will not object.

The Clerk read as follows:

69. Potash: Bicarbonate of, and carbonate of, refined, one-half of 1 cent per pound; hydrate of, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound; hydrate of, in sticks or rolls, 1 cent per pound; chlorate of, chromate and bichromate of, 1 cent per pound; cyanide of, 1½ cents per pound; nitrate of, or saltpeter, crude, $3 per ton; refined, $7 per ton; permanganate of, 1½ cents per pound; prussiate of, red, 2 cents per pound; yellow, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 19, lines 5 to 8, by striking out the words "Potash: Bicarbonate of, and carbonate of, refined, one-half of 1 cent per pound; hydrate of, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound; hydrate of, in sticks or rolls, 1 cent per pound."

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Potash: Bicarbonate of, one-half of 1 cent per pound; caustic potash or hydrate of, refined, in sticks or rolls, 1 cent per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes to put caustic potash—not refined—on the free list, where it is now. The bill proposes to transfer unrefined caustic potash to the dutiable list. Another household necessity transferred from the free list to the dutiable list under the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 19, lines 10 and 11, in the paragraph headed "Potash," by striking out the words "nitrate of, or saltpeter, crude, $3 per ton; refined, $7 per ton," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "nitrate of, or saltpeter, refined, $7 per ton."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, crude saltpeter is now on the free list. My amendment, if agreed to, would leave crude saltpeter upon the free list. The bill proposes to place it upon the dutiable list. Another of those cases where it is proposed to put a tariff on the crude article and at the same time reduce the tariff on the refined article. If my recollection is correct, the present tariff on refined saltpeter is $10 a ton, and this bill proposes to put a tariff of $3 a ton on the crude article and reduce the tariff on the refined article $3 a ton. Gentlemen may imagine that that will maintain the industry in the country, but the result will be to drive out the refining of crude saltpeter in this country and the bringing of refined saltpeter in from abroad and in the end largely increase the cost of saltpeter to those who use it in this country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is laboring under the delusion that refined nitrate of potash is made out of crude nitrate of potash.

That is incorrect. The crude nitrate of potash is used in the manufacture of gunpowder and so is the refined nitrate of potash, but the latter is made out of potassium chloride and not out of crude nitrate of potash. We have put a tax on $3 a ton on the crude nitrate of potash, an ad valorem equivalent of 4½ per cent, at which rate we anticipate duties of more than $11,000. At the same time we have reduced the rate upon the refined nitrate of potash from 11 per cent ad valorem to 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. What is crude saltpeter used for?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is used also in the manufacture of gunpowder.

Mr. MANN. What else is it used for? It is the most common kind of antiseptic in the country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is not used at all as an antiseptic. It is used in the manufacture of gunpowder and nitric acid.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman can not buy a ham but that has saltpeter in it or can not buy a piece of preserved beef that has not saltpeter in it. The color of all these meats comes from saltpeter. The gentleman proposes to tax this necessity of the people so far as eating is concerned. We have it on the free list. The gentleman proposes to put it on the dutiable list.

Mr. BUTLER. This is not going to threaten our ham, is it?

Mr. MANN. It is going to add to the high cost of living.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. We introduced the other one, which is used for the same purpose.

Mr. MANN. It is going to add to the high cost of living. The gentleman is not familiar with the subject at all, neither is his expert. If he had studied the pure-food question as long as I have he would know something about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

76. Vanillin, 10 cents per ounce; vanilla beans, 50 cents per pound; tonka beans, 25 cents per pound.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 20, lines 20 and 21, by striking out the following: "Vanilla beans, 50 cents per pound."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, vanilla beans are now on the free list. This bill proposes to place a duty of 50 cents a pound on them. My amendment proposes to leave vanilla beans upon the free list. They are the basis of the vanilla flavor to a large extent. Some of the vanilla flavors are made in other ways, however. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. The ice cream flavors, especially.

Mr. MANN. But the real vanilla flavor is made from these vanilla beans. The gentleman proposes to place a high tariff upon them, not for that purpose, but in order to encourage fraudulent vanilla extracts made from other articles—synthetic articles. The pure, natural vanilla extract is based upon, and it is made from, the articles that they propose to put a high tariff on. They are reducing the tariff on coal-tar products, some of which can be used for the manufacture of various extracts that come close to vanilla extract. We are in favor of maintaining a free list as to vanilla beans and are for the pure article on our tables and in our households.

Mr. BUTLER. And in our ice cream.

Mr. MANN. And in our household foods, in our ice cream, and in other things. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] evidently has the impression that the principal use of vanilla is in ice cream.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sorry to say to my friend that it is not. You will find it in the coffee and water and everything. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Vanilla flavoring is used in a very large percentage or number of articles prepared for food in a household, in a very small percentage of flavor, but used to a very large extent. I dare say there is hardly a household in this country where you can not find a bottle of vanilla extract in the kitchen.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the tax which we have proposed upon vanilla beans is simply a tax upon a luxury, and it will produce a revenue, at 50 cents a pound, of $575,000. The extract of real vanilla beans as described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is very seldom met with in the household. The ordinary object which is in use in the kitchen of the average home comes from vanillin, which is an extract of the oil of cloves and is a synthetic imitation of the real vanilla extract. We have reduced the rates of duty upon vanillin from 20 cents an ounce to 10 cents an ounce, and in putting a tax upon vanilla beans we believe we are collecting revenue on a noncompetitive product which goes into the manufacture of a luxury and is a most proper subject of taxation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill puts a tariff on unground cloves, the raw material from which vanillin is made; it leaves a higher tax on the raw material from which vanillin is made than it puts upon the article itself, vanillin, in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, no. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. The rate which we put on vanillin is equal to about 40 per cent ad valorem, while the tax on unground cloves is only 20 per cent ad valorem.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman be willing to return to paragraph 56? We have finished the dutiable list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would prefer to finish the bill, but if the gentleman desires it I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the committee will return to paragraph 56.

Mr. BARTHOLOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLOTT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 16, lines 4 and 5, by striking out after the word "unmanufactured" the words "15 per cent ad valorem but not less than 40 cents per ton" and inserting the words "$1.50 per ton." And in line 5, after the word "manufactured," strike out the words "20 per cent ad valorem but not less than $1.30 per ton" and insert the words "$5.50 per ton."

Mr. BARTHOLOTT. Mr. Chairman, under the Dingley bill the rate on barytes, unmanufactured, was 75 cents a ton, and as at that time there were practically no importations from Europe that rate was sufficient to enable the industry to exist. But soon the importations from Canada, Newfoundland, and Germany began, and they increased at such a rapid rate, namely, from 1,000 tons to 12,000 tons, within a few years that the barytes industry of Missouri was threatened with utter destruction, owing to a lack of proper protection. At the time the Payne bill was under consideration I saw with my eyes hundreds and thousands of tons of barytes piled up along the Iron Mountain Railroad tracks which had been mined, but could not be disposed of, owing to the fact that foreign barytes could be laid down in the port of New York at a rate several dollars lower per ton than the Missouri product. Recognizing this condition of affairs, Mr. PAYNE and his Republican colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee agreed to increase the rate from 75 cents to $1.50, and while this was hardly sufficient protection to make the industry profitable and prosperous it enabled it at least to live. Now it is proposed to cut down this meager measure of protection to 40 cents a ton, a little more than one-half of what it was when the operators had gone out of business and the miners were idle. The inevitable effect will be to wipe this Missouri industry off the map and to substitute for our own product the product of Germany and Canada. What this means to the people of southeast Missouri will be seen from the figures, which show that at the present time 52 per cent of the total barytes output of the country is mined in Washington County, of my State. It is a great part of the subsistence of those people, and if this bill passes there will stand between them and the utter destruction of their main industry only one man, the President of the United States. I protest, Mr. Chairman, against a policy which will sacrifice the industries of my State to a mere theory, and I call upon my Democratic colleagues, especially my colleague from the thirteenth district [Mr. HENSLEY], one of whose predecessors, also a Democrat, once introduced a bill to make the duty on barytes $5 a ton, to join me in the defense of the vital interests of our common State. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that what the gentleman from Missouri has so well said about the history of the barytes industry in Missouri applies exactly to the industry in Tennessee; and the legislation which affected it, namely, the Dingley law and the Payne-Aldrich law, resulted precisely in Tennessee as it did in the State of Missouri. With the low duty carried in the Dingley law and the increased importations the barytes mills and mines in eastern Tennessee and other Southern States were compelled to shut down and go out of business. With the increase of duty carried in the Payne-Aldrich bill, immediately operations were resumed in the mines and the mills were started again. They are now in operation. If this bill should become a law, every mine will close down, every plant will stop, a large number of men will be thrown out of employment, and the capital invested will practically be lost.

Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from a pioneer southern man in this industry, who, I think, is the best-posted man in all the Southern States on this subject. He has been actively and extensively engaged in calling the attention of capital to deposits of barytes in the South and inducing parties to come there to inaugurate this industry.

I refer to Mr. Charles A. Weller, a reputable business man of my town (Knoxville, Tenn.), who has voted and supported the Democratic ticket, but I venture the assertion that if you pass this bill and destroy his business, he, like thousands of others, will cease to vote the Democratic ticket, and will support that party which stands for the protection of American capital, the American mills, and the American wage earner. [Applause on the Republican side.] I protest against the destruction of this new and promising southern industry.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the letter will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. R. W. AUSTIN, KNOXVILLE, TENN., February 12, 1912.
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: As I understand it, the new schedule proposed on chemicals embraces a change in the present tariff covering barytes. This change, as I have gotten it, is meant to be misleading, so as not only to put this product back to the old rate, but even lower, by substituting an ad valorem for the present rate under pigments for paints, etc. For example, they are calling the ore barytes earth unmanufactured, which now carries a rate of $1.50 per ton and is selling in this country at $6.75, including the duty of $1.50 and freight $1.90. The proposed schedule is 45 per cent ad valorem, which, as I understand, will apply on the cost of the ore at the mines, which is around about $1.40 per ton. As to the cost at the mines, I have this information from Hon. Robert F. Skinner, consul general at Hamburg, Germany.

Cost at mines	$1.42
Barge to Hamburg	1.30
Ocean freight to United States	1.95
Duty	1.50

Total ----- $6.17

It will cost something from docks to plants, but that should not be considered, however. The total price now asked in New York and Philadelphia is $6.75 per long ton. Our freight rate to New York is, in long tons, $5.21; to Philadelphia, $4.09; so you can see what our competition is with the duty at $1.50, whereas the new duty would be, as I understand it, 45 per cent of $1.42—about 64 cents. The new schedule on the ground product is 40 per cent ad valorem, and the old rate $5.25 per short ton; deducting the cost of ore, milling, and transportation, they get about $7 per ton, a good price in Germany; this reduces the duty to about $2.85 per ton, and so, with the highest product made, the artificial carbonate, the proposed rate is 30 per cent ad valorem when the present rate is one-half cent per pound.

At the prices named you the foreign ores now command about 65 to 75 per cent of the business of the United States, but since the duty was raised at last Congress there has been great activity in the development of the American ores and manufacture of this product; but if this reduction is made it will certainly kill the business, as we can not compete with water rates.

We have in this district, as well as in other sections of the South, the largest deposits of barytes in this country, which has just been placed in a position to be handled, at a small profit, and large amounts raised to develop the business, but if the present duty is lowered, as proposed, it will kill off a large business in this country and give it to foreign markets and, in turn, benefit only three or four large importers.

I will be glad to have any information you can give on this subject, as well as your assistance in defeating a measure that will kill an industry that could not live heretofore because of a lack of protection with a proposed change in the duty that will make it still lower than ever before when really there should be an increase on the present rates of duty.

Thanking you for your attention to this matter, and with kind regards, I remain,
Yours, truly,

CHAS. A. WELLER.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the letter which the gentleman from Tennessee has sent to the desk contains some of the errors customary in the presentation of the case of persons asking for tariff taxation. He says that it costs $1.95 for freight, $1.50 for duty, and he says that with the duty paid it makes the cost $6.90 in New York. As the unit of value in 1911 was $2.46, that would make the cost in New York $5.99, nearly a dollar out of the way in the calculation; but of course such a trifle as that does not stand in the way of anybody who is seeking for tariff protection.

In my judgment the most indefensible raise in the Payne law was the doubling of the duty upon barytes from 75 cents to $1.50 a ton. Even for those persons who advocated it the result of the imposition of that duty must have been a grievous disappointment, because the price of barytes in this country has been falling, and has continued to fall in spite of the doubling of the duty. The price in 1909 was $3.55; in 1910, $3.02; and in 1911, $2.46, a ton, so that the result of doubling the tariff tax upon barytes was not to increase the price, as had been hoped for by those desiring the protection, but simply to impede and make more difficult the manufacture of paints in the eastern seaboard States, where they were obliged to pay freight rates upon the barytes shipped from Missouri to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman will excuse me, I wish to conclude my argument. Barytes is a mineral which is found right at the surface of the ground. It requires little or no labor to take it out. It is chiefly produced by farmers in the rare intervals when they have nothing else to do, and is trundled by them to the sidings of the railways and dumped there for transportation. It is not worthy of laying a heavy tax upon the paint manufacturers of the East, and it would be inconsistent in us to retain the high tariff duty on barytes, inasmuch as we have cut the duties on paints, the finished products, from 30 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is not the gentleman's statement—that the price has fallen—a complete refutation of the Democratic theory?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The price would have fallen very much more if the manufacturers of paint had been able to obtain it at the lower rate of duty.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman says the price has decreased from $5 to $2.46.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In spite of the fact that the duty has been raised from 75 cents to $1.50?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And the manufacturers of the East would have gotten it 75 cents cheaper if it had not been for the duty.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The result will be to throw all the labor out of employment which is engaged in the production of barytes and to leave the product in the bowels of the earth.

Mr. AUSTIN. And we will not buy paint for a cent less.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

83. Calcium, acetate of, brown and gray, and chloride of, crude.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend. paragraph 83, page 21, by striking out the word "and" in line 19, before the word "chloride"; by striking out the period and inserting in place thereof a comma, after the word "crude," in line 20; and by adding to the paragraph the following: "And nitrate of, crude."

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment on behalf of the committee, as the nitrate of calcium is probably under another name free now under existing law. In the Payne law lime nitrogen is free. This is a fertilizer known as nitrate of calcium, made in Norway by an invention of a genius there from the nitrate of the air combined with lime. It is made into this product nitrate of calcium, and, as I say, is used as a fertilizer. I believe it was the intention of the framers of the Payne bill to include it under the nomenclature of lime nitrogen. But in order that there may be no doubt about it, I offer this amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

88. Drugs, such as barks, beans, berries, buds, bulbs, bulbous roots, excrescences, fruits, flowers, dried fibers, dried insects, grains, gums, herbs, leaves, lichens, mosses, nuts, nutgalls, logs, roots, stems, vegetables, seeds (aromatic, not garden seeds), seeds of morbid growth, weeds, and woods used expressly for dyeing or tanning; any of the foregoing which are natural and uncombined drugs and not edible and not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, and are in a crude state, not advanced in value or condition by peeling, shredding, grinding, chipping, crushing, or any other process or treatment whatever beyond that essential to the proper packing of the drugs and the prevention of decay or deterioration pending manufacture: Provided, That no article containing alcohol shall be admitted free of duty under this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend. page 22, lines 14 and 15, by striking out the words "peeling, shredding, grinding, chipping, crushing, or," and by striking out in line 15 the word "other."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

89. Magnesite, crude, not purified.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend. page 22, line 20, by striking out the words "magnesite, crude, not purified," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "magnesite, crude or calcined, not purified."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is to restore to the free list magnesite, crude or calcined, not purified, which the gentleman has taken out of the free list and put upon the dutiable list.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the same question that the gentleman from Illinois and I debated when we dealt with the subject of magnesite on the dutiable list. It is the basis of the white pigment, a first-class revenue producer, and we expect to get $89,000 revenue.

Mr. MANN. At the expense of the trade. The gentleman's theory now that the tax is paid by the manufacturer and never at the cost of the consumer was not always entertained by that gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. My theory is not correctly stated by the gentleman from Illinois. The tax paid by the manufacturer would go to the consumer if his top rate was prohibitive, but since we have cut down the top rate, the consumer will get it cheaper and the manufacturer can not unload on him.

Mr. MANN. He can unload his factory and close it up. That is what will happen with a great many manufacturers if the gentleman's bill becomes a law. Of course, it is easy to speculate about these things. It is easy to say from that side that this bill will do no harm and no injustice to the country, because we all know on both sides of the Chamber that hardly anybody here would vote for the bill at any stage of it if there was the slightest possibility of its being enacted into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

93. Potash, crude, or "black salts"; carbonate of potash, crude; sulphate of potash, crude or refined; and mullate of potash.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend. page 23, lines 3 and 4, by striking out the words "Potash, crude, or 'black salts'; carbonate of potash, crude"; and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Potash, crude, or 'black salts'; carbonate of potash, crude or refined; hydrate of, or caustic potash, not including refined, in sticks or rolls; nitrate of potash, or saltpeter, crude."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the last two or three amendments which I have offered have been to the free list carried in this bill. The amendments offered before were to the dutiable list carried in the bill. This amendment proposes to place in the free list caustic potash and crude saltpeter, where they now are. I confess that I do not quite understand the purpose of inserting some of these items in the free list, which are already in the free list, and which are not disturbed by the change of law. Just what will happen in connection with some of the provisions in this bill and the existing provisions in the free list I do not know. I am very sure that the gentleman from New York does not know. This bill proposes to substitute various paragraphs of it in place of Schedule A, the chemical schedule of the Payne tariff law. It does not propose to substitute any portion of the bill for the various paragraphs of the free list in the Payne tariff law. It is to be made a part of the Payne tariff law. You will find in the law a provision placing an article upon the dutiable list, and in the same law a provision placing the same article upon the free list. It is quite true that the amendment, which would be this bill, if enacted into law, being subsequent in point of time, although in the same law, would control, and that the items carried into the law by this bill would supersede the items in the existing law, although in the same law. It is also true—and I make the suggestion for the benefit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] and his assistant chemist—that he has entirely misconceived the effect of some of the provisions in this bill placing articles upon the dutiable list in connection with the law, as to articles upon the free list; and if this bill should ever become a law it would take a Philadelphia lawyer at his very best to unravel some of the difficulties unnecessarily placed in the law by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee at any great length, as everybody is probably getting tired, but I will explain for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the free list attached to the dutiable list in the Underwood bill contains, as the gentleman of course knows, not only the objects which we transfer to the free list, but also other objects which were already upon the free list. We have combined them in this bill, together with the dutiable list, merely to make it readier of reference for any Member who wished to ascertain what tax was laid upon the cognate substance, for instance, the raw material or the finished product. It would have been practically impossible to invade the whole of the free list of the Payne law and attach the chemical part of it to this bill, because there are some subjects in that free list which may or may not be properly classifiable as chemicals, so that we have limited ourselves to the method that I have described. At the same time, of course, all the matters which are now in the Payne free list and which are not mentioned in this bill are still in the free list, and those which we have mentioned in the free list here, which are not in the Payne free list, we change. Those which we have added to the free list would go on to the free list if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. HILL. I would like to inquire if it is the expectation, in case this bill should become a law, and all things are possible in the providence of the Almighty—

Mr. MANN. Well, this is not.

Mr. HILL. Whether the gentleman intends, or the committee intends, that this free list shall be published and printed in the tariff law as a part of Schedule A, or whether it is intended that it shall modify the free list of Schedule A of the whole law.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to answer that. I should be inclined to think that these articles would fall into their proper places upon the free list of the law in case this amendment to the law were adopted.

Mr. HILL. By what authority? There is no provision striking out from the Payne free list.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. They substitute the other—by that authority. The difficulty is that the Payne law has 14 different schedules, and but one free list attached to the whole 14, and it would be a very difficult matter to select all the articles in that free list which deal with the chemical industry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, this bill proposes to substitute for the items in the Payne bill from 1 to 83, inclusive, this bill necessarily wiping out everything that is mentioned in the Payne bill, if it becomes a law, from 1 to 83 and repealing it, and this will take its place. Now, it puts into the chemical Schedule A of the Payne bill a free-list section as well as a general free-list section in the bill.

Mr. HILL. Necessarily the same plan would be followed out with regard to other schedules, making a dutiable list and a free list in every schedule if there were things to put on the free list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is possible in some of the other sections of the bill we may not pass them as amendments to the Payne bill.

Mr. HILL. The embarrassment I can see in regard to the situation is that we might find articles dutiable in a schedule, and they might still remain on the free list in the law. Of course I understand that the courts would probably hold that the last legislation would prevail under the rule that where there is an amendment to the law the last-named rate becomes effective.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no question about what the court would hold, as it has been held too often. They would hold where we have put a tax on an article in this bill it is conclusive evidence that that nullifies anything in the Payne bill.

Mr. HILL. There is another question that I would like to ask. What would be the situation where we have taken articles from other schedules which are already dutiable and have put them in here at a lower rate of duty, not striking them out from the other schedules, but leaving them at a higher rate of duty there? Would not the court hold that the higher rate of duty would prevail?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has not read the last clause of the bill, "that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. HILL. I have read the whole bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That answers the question.

Mr. HILL. But when you strike out from the present law all of the paragraphs of Schedule A and substitute new items from other schedules and the free list as well, why do you not change the other schedules accordingly?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because the general repealing clause takes care of that.

Mr. HILL. I hope so.

Mr. MANN. Not only will items on the free list of this bill be placed under the chemical schedule of the Payne law, but they will be placed there under the head of a dutiable list. The Payne law contains a dutiable list, so labeled and named in the law itself. It contains a free list, so labeled and named in the law itself, and with characteristic logic the gentleman proposes now to take items out from under the heading of free list and put them free under the head of dutiable list, so that a man who examines the law will need a decision of the court to know what the tariff law is. If it should become a law, no one by reading the law would be able to tell that which was in force and that which was not in force.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to section 2, on page 80, the maximum and minimum law, by which he will see that there is a distinct reference to the dutiable list of the Payne Act, which means everything up to the free list of the Payne Act, and it seems to me to avoid trouble in the future that at some time in the progress of this bill the free list of the Payne Act should be modified to correspond with the items named in the free list of this bill, and they should not be made a part of Schedule A. I think a very serious complication may arise there in the future.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the gentleman's contention, and if I agreed with him and thought so I would amend the bill—

Mr. HILL. No; I would not ask to amend it now, but I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the gentleman is correct about it. I have permission to make committee amendments, but I think that the gentleman is mistaken about the matter.

I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20182—the chemical schedule—and directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. JACOWAY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James C. Williams, second session Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.
